On the other hand, plaintiff is entitled to recover his actual damages only, unless punitive damages are allowable and proper, and he cannot recover the fair market value of all the property taken when it is shown that some of the property was returned to him.[66] Likewise, where property is wrongfully seized and sold, and the proceeds were credited on the judgment obtained by plaintiff in attachment, defendant in that action, when suing on the bond, cannot receive credit for such amount paid on the judgment and then recover the full value of the property sold,[67] and a debtor, recovering property sold under attachment, cannot recover the value thereof in an action on the attachment bond.[68] Where the attachment is levied upon personal property of defendant, and such personalty is sold under a short-order sale as being perishable, or where defendant agrees with plaintiff to waive the necessity of obtaining an order for a short-order sale and the expense consequent thereto, and permits the property to be sold at the insistence of plaintiff as under a short-order sale, and therefore consents to the sale without prejudice to his rights, such forced premature sale of defendant's property, to his damage, furnishes a basis for a recovery by him under the attachment bond.[69] Where, however, plaintiff in attachment is not threatening or seeking to obtain a short-order sale, and where defendant, before final judgment, voluntarily agrees to the sale of the property, he cannot recover damage sustained by him as a result of such premature sale of the property.[70]

So far as recovery on an attachment bond depends on the amount of goods taken by virtue of the attachment, the marshal's inventory controls, in the absence of definite evidence to the contrary.[71]

(3) Injury to, or Depreciation of, Property

Injury to or depreciation in value of property is an element of damage recoverable in an action on the attachment bond.

Injury to or depreciation in value of personal property attached caused by the attachment is an element of actual damage, and may be recovered in an appropriate action or proceeding therefor,[72] and the rule in this respect has been held not to be affected by the fact that the injury or depreciation was the result of the negligence of the officer making the levy,[73] or that part of the depreciation was due to use and abuse of the property while in possession of the sheriff.[74]

Where plaintiff in attachment causes the goods seized to be sold in such large quantities that the price realized is unnecessarily depreciated, this may be an element of damages in an action for tort, but is not an element of damage in an action on an attachment bond.[75]

Under a statute providing that whenever property has been taken by an officer under a writ of attachment and it is made to appear satisfactorily to the court that the interest of the parties to the action will be subserved by a sale thereof, the court may order the property sold and the proceeds to be deposited in court, a loss caused by a decrease in the value of corporate stock while it was being held under a writ of attachment cannot be recovered from the sureties on the bond, at least where no application was made to the court for a sale of the stocks.[76] Also, where shares of stocks could be released by merely paying the poundage, an amount amply secured by the bond, recovery cannot be had for loss in value of the shares during the attachment.[77]

Real property. Where the owner of the premises attached is not deprived by the attachment of the possession or use thereof, nothing more than nominal damages can be recovered.[78]

(4) Loss of Use of Property

The plaintiff in an action on an attachment bond may recover the value of the use of property seized for the period during which he was deprived of its use.

Rule stated

"Under such circumstances we regard it the settled rule of this state that wrong done by the mere issuance and levy of a writ of attachment upon real estate, without other evidence of actual injury, will not sustain a recovery of substantial damages . . . It is elementary, also, that if actual damages be not shown exemplary damages cannot be allowed."—New Sharon Creamery Co. v. Knowlton, 103 N.W. 770, 132 Iowa 672, quoted in Thielen v. Schechinger, 233 N.W. 750, 752, 211 Iowa 470.

Growing crops

In an action on an attachment bond for attachment of a growing crop of corn, which was not interfered with, and no portion of which was lost or destroyed, and seventy-five days later was returned to owner in same condition as when levied on, no recovery could be had for depreciation in value.—Clare v. Sewell, 203 N.W. 557, 113 Neb. 441.

Although property seized under a writ of attachment wrongfully sued out has been returned to or recovered by defendant in attachment, it is proper, in estimating his damages, to consider the injury which he has sustained by being deprived of the use of the property,[79] and to award him, as actual damages, the value of the use of the property for the period during which it was held under the writ[80]

The mere fact that the owner of attached property had plans for its disposal involving a speculative sale, or even a gratuitous loan, does not prevent a recovery of the reasonable market value of its use in an action on the attachment bond.[81]

The fact that attached personal property could not be used further in the county does not indicate that its adaptability and commercial requirements for use elsewhere would not give value to the right to possess and use it Accordingly, where equipment is useless in the locality where attached, but is in demand elsewhere, the damage recoverable is the rental value of the equipment where in demand, less the reasonable cost of removing it to the place of use.[82]

(5) Injury to Business

As a general rule, loss of, or injury to, business is not regarded as actual damage recoverable in an action on an attachment bond.

In some jurisdictions a defendant in attachment is allowed to recover compensation for injury to or loss of his business as part of the actual damages for a wrongful attachment,[83] but the more general view is that these matters are not such proximate or natural results of an attachment of property as to be proper for consideration in estimating damages in a case where an award of exemplary damages would not be proper.[84] Where, however, the elements of malice and lack of probable cause are present, the injury to or loss of business resulting from the wrongful act is quite proper for consideration in assessing damages.[85]

(6) Loss of Profits

The authorities are divided as to whether the loss of prospective profits may be allowed as actual damage; in any case the damage must be readily ascertainable.

While there are some decisions which hold that a recovery may be had for damages caused by the loss of probable or prospective profits, although the attachment was merely wrongful,[86] it is generally held that this is not an element of damage unless the attachment was malicious and without probable cause[87] At all events, recovery cannot be permitted for the loss of profits on a sale of property subject to attachment where the profits are contingent, doubtful, or highly speculative.[88]

(7) Injury to Credit

In some jurisdictions, damages are recoverable for loss of credit, especially where the institution of the attachment proceedings was malicious and without probable cause.

The loss of a possible sale is not an element of damage where it is not shown that there were negotiations with a prospect for a sale.—Thielen v Schechinger, 233 N W. 750, 211 Iowa 470

Where consideration was shares of stock in development corporation

Where oil-drilling machinery and equipment which were attached had been sold by the owner to a corporation organized for oil development, for fifty thousand shares of its stock, the damages from inability to carry out and realize on the contract were too remote, speculative, and uncertain, particularly when not within the contemplation of the surety on the attachment bond.—Atlas Development Co. v National Surety Co., 212 P. 196, 190 Cal. 329.

In some jurisdictions it is considered that injury to the credit of defendant in attachment is a natural and proximate result of a wrongful attachment, and is therefore proper to be considered in estimating the actual damages,[89] but other courts hold the view that such injury is too remote and speculative to be considered as an element of actual damages.[90]

Analogy to exemplary damages. A number of cases have treated a recovery for injury to credit as analogous to a recovery of exemplary damages, holding that a recovery may be had therefore where the suing out of the writ was malicious and without probable cause,[91] but not otherwise.[92]

(8) Injury to Reputation or Feelings

Damages for injury to reputation or feelings is not recoverable unless the attachment was sued out maliciously and without probable cause.

While it has been held that a recovery may be had for an injury to feelings where the attachment was sued out maliciously and without probable cause,[93] it is generally held that there can be no recovery for injuries resulting from humiliation or embarrassment, as such damages are too remote, accidental, and variable.[94] Likewise, damages for injuries to reputation are not considered actual damages, and hence are not recoverable unless the attachment was malicious as well as wrongful[95]

(9) Loss of Time

Ordinarily the attachment defendant may recover for loss of time caused by the wrongful attachment.

Where a debtor's stock in trade is wrongfully attached, he may, it seems, recover for the resulting loss of time in his business;[96] and, in some jurisdictions, he may recover for loss of time incident to defending the attachment suit,[97] but where such recovery is permitted, the damage must be the proximate result of the attachment, and its reasonableness must be shown.[98]

(10) Interest

As a general rule interest may be allowed on money, or on the value of property, wrongfully attached, in an action on the bond.

Although it has been held that interest on damages allowed for wrongful attachment cannot be recovered,[99] there is also considerable authority for the view that an allowance of interest on the money[1] or the value of the property[2] wrongfully detained is proper.

(11) Costs

Costs awarded to or incurred by defendant in attachment are recoverable as damages in an action on the bond.

The recovery in an action upon an attachment bond may include costs awarded to or incurred by defendant in attachment.[3] However, where plaintiff in attachment has paid such costs, they should not be allowed as damages in an action on the bond.[4]

(12) Expenses of Litigation

(a) Defending against attachment
(b) Defending principal suit
(c) Proceeding to recover damages

(a) Defending against Attachment

Expenses incurred in procuring a dissolution of the attachment are items of actual damage recoverable in an action on an attachment bond.

It is generally held that one against whom an attachment has been wrongfully sued out is entitled to recover, as a part of his damages for the wrong, the expenses which he incurred in defending against, and procuring dissolution of, such attachment [5] The recovery of such expenses depends upon whether the attachment produced or caused them.[6]

Counsel fees. While it is held in some jurisdictions that a defendant in attachment cannot be allowed any counsel fees whatever as part of his damages for the wrongful suing out of an attachment against him,[7] the more generally prevailing view is that one against whom an attachment has been wrongfully sued out is entitled to recover reasonable counsel fees incurred or expended in defending against such attachment.[8]

The actual rendition of services by the attorney in defending against the attachment is of course necessary in order to warrant a recovery for counsel fees,[9] and where no defense is interposed to an attachment, the expense of consultation with attorneys is not allowable [10]

Where services were not rendered until after judgment in the attachment suit there can be no recovery therefor.[11]

Necessity for actual payment. The right of defendant in attachment to recover attorney's fees is the same whether such fees have been actually paid or a mere liability therefor incurred,[12] but

Where, in settlement of an action in attachment, involving a liability on the attachment bond, defendant's attorneys received a certain sum as attorney's fees, and thereafter such settlement was set aside, and a new trial granted, on which the court made an allowance to defendants for fees rendered, it was proper to require that such allowance be credited with the amount received by the attorneys under the settlement, which they retained—Kilmer v. Although there is authority to the contrary,[14] it is generally held that the expenses incurred in defending the principal suit on the merits are items of actual damage recoverable in an action on the bond,[15] especially where a defense on the merits is necessary to procure a dissolution of the attachment[16]

Counsel fees. It has been held that no allowance can be made for attorney's fees for services in defending the principal action,[17] in the absence of a stipulation therefor in the bond sued on[18] or a statutory provision for such an allowance;[19] and this has been held to be true, even though jurisdiction was obtained solely by attaching the property of a nonresident who subsequently appeared and defended the action.[20] However, according to other authority counsel fees for a defense on the merits may be allowed, at least where such defense was necessary to procure a dissolution of the attachment.[21] Under this rule, however, counsel fees in defending the principal action

"Of course the distinction is familiar between a mere indemnity against damages and an indemnity against liability . . . But probably the cases in regard to indemnities, strictly so called, are hardly applicable The parties to the undertaking, by its terms, do not agree to indemnify but to pay such damages as the defendant may sustain Nor is the undertaking given to protect the defendant against the acts of some third person, or against some consequence of the defendant's own acts, as is often the case in bonds of indemnity The undertaking is to protect the defendant against acts of the plaintiff which may prove to have been unjustifiable There is every reason, therefore, for giving a construction to the undertaking which shall protect the defendant against damages incurred, if caused by the plaintiff's unjustifiable act The defendant should be made secure, and should not merely be indemnified This seems to us the just construction to be put upon this contract, considering its language and its purpose"—Crounse v Syracuse, C & N Y R Co, 32 Hun 497, 500, affirmed 97 N Y 631, quoted in Elsman v. In action against nonresident

The expenses of defense of the main action against a nonresident are recoverable, in an action on the bond, where the warrant is good on its face; and it is not necessary, in such case, to move to dissolve the attachment, because such motion would be futile under the circumstances—Thropp v Erb, 174 N E 67, 255 N Y 75, 71 A L R 1455, affirming 239 N Y S 836, 228 App Div 760—Straschitz v Ungar, 153 N Y S 118

(1) Where jurisdiction is obtained by attachment in an action against a nonresident, and a defense on the merits is required and a motion to dissolve the attachment would not lie, attorney's fees may be awarded as damages although incurred in the defense of the main action—Moseley v Fidelity & Deposit Co of Maryland, 189 P 862, 33 Idaho 37, 25 A. L R 564—Thropp v. Erb, 174 N E. 67, 255 N Y. 75, 71 A L R 1455, affirming 239 N.Y S 836, 228 App Div. 760—Elsman v Glens Falls Indemnity Co, 262 N Y.S. 642, 146 Misc 631.

(2) Without motion to vacate an attachment on the property of a non-cannot be recovered where such defense was not necessary to obtain a dissolution of the attachment, or to have the property released from the attachment.[22] Thus, where the attachment might have been vacated as a matter of law, and defendant in attachment fails to move to have it vacated,[23] or where no levy has been made,[24] counsel fees in defending the principal action are not recoverable in an action on the attachment bond.

(c) Proceeding to Recover Damages

The expenses of an action on the bond are generally not recoverable on the bond as damages for wrongful attachment

Expenses incurred by the trial of a counterclaim or an independent action on an attachment bond for damages for the wrongful suing out of an attachment are generally not recoverable in an action on the bond,[25] but it has been held that the costs of necessary steps taken for the purpose of assessing the damages may be recovered.[26]

Counsel fees. Counsel fees incurred in connection with an action on an attachment bond are not recoverable in such action,[27] except in jurisdictions where such fees are allowable, and taxed by the court, as costs [28]

d. Mitigation of Damages

(1) Duty to mitigate
(2) Matters in mitigation

(1) Duty to Mitigate

Ordinarily, the defendant in attachment must mitigate damages where practicable.

It is, of course, the duty of defendant in attachment to mitigate damages where practicable.[29]

(2) Matters in Mitigation

Defendant in an action on an attachment bond may show in mitigation such matters as reduce the actual damage sustained by plaintiff

Defendant in an action on an attachment bond has the right to show that he offered to return the property seized,[30] that part of the property at-resident, the expense of defending the attachment suit on the merits cannot be recovered in an action on the attachment undertaking when the attachment is invalid on its face—Thropp v Erb, supra—Olsen v U S Fidelity & Guaranty Co, 128 N E 908, 230 N Y. 31, modifying 173 N Y S 916, 187 App Div 882.

Nonresident attorneys

The fees of nonresident attorneys are recoverable, even where resident attorneys are also employed, where the facts make such employment prudent, as where the nonresident attorneys are familiar with the case. —Elsman v. Glens Falls Indemnity Co, 262 N Y S 642, 146 Misc 631.

Where motion to dissolve attachment futile

In an action on several attachment bonds, counsel fees for defending the action wherein defendant attached plaintiff's property, upon its merits, were allowable, notwithstanding plaintiff made no effort to dismiss the attachment in advance of trial, where no motion had any chance of success except to dismiss complaint as insufficient in law on its face, and such motion plaintiff did make and thus disposed of the entire litigation. —T W. Warner Co. v Andrews, (C C. A N Y) 73 F (2d) 287, certiorari denied 55 S Ct. 515, 294 U.S. 717, 79 L. Ed. 1250.

Where motion to dissolve denied

In an action on a bond, where a motion to dissolve an attachment was denied because the proceedings were regular on their face, and a trial on the merits was had wherein judgment was rendered for defendant, a reasonable attorney's fee for defending the suit is recoverable as an element of damage—Van Sickle v Franklin, 162 P 950, 62 Okl 289—McFarland v Ratcliffe, 9 P (2d) 1090, 167 Wash. 673.

In Alabama

(1) In an action on a bond for wrongful attachment, the attorney's fee recoverable is properly extended to the entire defense in attachment suit where the only way to dissolve the attachment is to defend on the merits—Smith v. Summers, 112 So. 344, 215 Ala. 690.

(2) Where there is principal suit to which attachment is ancillary, counsel fees recoverable are limited to defense of ancillary writ—Smith v. Summers, supra.

Construction of terms of bond for costs

"It is the opinion of this court that it was well within the contemplation of the parties that, if the warrant of attachment was vacated, necessary steps would have to be taken for the purpose of assessing the damages sustained because of the issuance of the warrant of attachment Such proceedings would result in the imposition of costs The provision, therefore, in the undertaking that 'the plaintiff would pay all costs which may be awarded and all damages that the defendant will sustain not exceeding the sum of $250' meant the damages sustained because of the issuance of the warrant of attachment plus the costs imposed in assessing such damages"—Olesen v. Fidelity & Deposit Co of Maryland, 262 N Y S 434, 436, 147 Misc 38

tached belonged to third persons;[31] or that defendant in attachment had replevied the property, sold it, and with the proceeds paid the debt to enforce which the attachment was sued out.[32] Any sum paid by plaintiff, in an attachment suit, for costs and damages awarded against him operates to reduce the liability specified in the undertaking given by the sureties.[33]

Damages cannot be reduced by showing that an execution was levied immediately after the discharge of the attachment;[34] or that plaintiff in attachment had a cause of action, where the petition in the action in which the attachment was issued was dismissed on the ground that there was no cause of action.[35] Where an attachment is dismissed because the affidavit therefor is defective, the fact that grounds for an attachment exist will not go in mitigation of damages if the damages sought are merely compensatory,[36] nor can it be shown in mitigation of actual damages that there was probable cause for suing out the attachment.[37] That attachment plaintiff subsequently caused a valid writ to be levied on the property for the owner's debt, may, however, be shown in mitigation of damages in an action on the bond.[38]

e. Amount of Allowance

(1) In general
(2) Limitation to penalty of bond

(1) In General

The amount of allowance, in an action on an attachment bond, is the sum of the items allowable under the facts of the particular case, and is not limited to the value of the property seized.

The amount of actual damages to be recovered for a wrongful attachment is of course the sum of those items which are proper to be allowed under the facts of the particular case and the law of the jurisdiction.[39] The recovery in such case is not limited to the value of the property attached, even where only actual damages were sustained. Thus, the rental value, or the value of the use, of attached property may be recovered, although the value of such use exceeds the sale value of the property.[40]

With respect to exemplary or punitive damages, it has been said that these should be in proportion to the actual damage sustained,[41] which does not, however, mean that one should be either in exact or approximate ratio to the other, but merely that the imposition of heavy exemplary damages, when the actual damage is small, is a circumstance which aids in determining whether passion instead of reason influenced the verdict.[42]

Limited to claim One counting on an attachment bond for wrongful attachment cannot recover more than his claim, even where he is otherwise entitled to an amount in excess thereof.[43]

(2) Limitation to Penalty of Bond

Ordinarily, the obligors of an attachment bond are not liable, in an action thereon, in a sum in excess of the penalty of such bond.

It would seem very clear, on principle, that the liability on an attachment bond cannot exceed the penal sum named therein, and, as a general rule, recovery will be limited thereto,[44] but there are, nevertheless, other decisions in which it has been denied that the liability on the bond is so limited.[45]

f. Set-Offs

Judgments, claims, and unliquidated demands may be set off against a claim for damages in an action on an attachment bond.

In an action on an attachment bond defendants may set off a judgment recovered in the action in which the attachment issued against the damages sustained by the wrongful attachment.[46] One defendant may set off against plaintiff his claim for borrowed money owed by the party to whose use the action is brought,[47] and this right is not affected by the fact that the set-off is a personal right and is not enjoyed in common by the sureties joined as codefendants.[48] In fact, it has been held that even unliquidated demands may be used in set-off.[49]

V. WRIT OR WARRANT

§ 180. Nature and Necessity

A writ of attachment is a process issued in a suit and commanding an officer to attach defendant's property for satisfaction of plaintiff's demands. The writ is essential to the validity of the attachment, and may be either an ancillary process forming no part of the pleadings, or both a process and the plaintiff's initial pleading.

The writ of attachment is the process issued at the institution or during the progress of an action commanding the sheriff or other proper officer to attach the property, rights, credits, or effects of defendant to satisfy the demands of plaintiff.[50]

The writ being the leading and essential process in the proceeding, it follows that there can be no attachment without issuance of the writ,[51] and that a seizure as on attachment without a writ is void.[52]

Where the suit is commenced by a writ of attachment it serves as both process and count of pleading and no declaration is necessary,[53] but the ancillary writ is not a pleading which permits of an answer, and it constitutes no part of, and is not embraced in, the pleadings in the action.[54]

§ 181. Time for Issuance

a. In general
b. At beginning of or during action
c. Interval allowed between filing affidavit and issue of writ

a. In General

The writ should be issued within the time, if any, prescribed by statute and not before the filing of a required affidavit and bond. If issuable only on court order, the writ should be issued as of the term at which awarded. Several writs should be issued in the order of demand.

Where the statute fixes a time within which the writ may issue, it must be issued within such prescribed time.[55]

A writ of attachment can never be issued before the filing of a required affidavit and bond.[56]

Where the attachment can be issued only on the order of the court, it should be issued as of the term at which it is awarded.[57]

Order of issue. Where several writs of attachment are sued out by different plaintiffs against the same defendant, they should be issued in the order in which the preliminary papers were received and the writs demanded.[58]

b. At Beginning of or during Action

(1) In general
(2) When action deemed commenced

(1) In General

Generally speaking, a writ of attachment must issue at the beginning, or during the pendency, of the action, and the writ will be void if issued either before the action began or after it ended.

58. Lick v. Madden, 25 Cal. 202—6 C.J. p 176 note 12.

In the case of ancillary attachment, the pendency of an action is a prerequisite to the right to the writ,[59] and a writ issued before an action is commenced is void and can give no lien;[60] but the writ may be issued contemporaneously with the commencement of the action,[61] or at any time thereafter before final judgment[62] and accrual of the right to execution.[63]

A writ of attachment must, however, be issued during the progress of the action[64] and cannot be issued after final judgment has been rendered,[65] nor after the suit has abated.[66]

(2) When Action Deemed Commenced

(a) On filing affidavit

(b) On filing complaint, declaration, or petition; or notice of motion

(c) On issuance or service of summons

(a) On Filing Affidavit

Under some practice the filing of the attachment affidavit is deemed to begin the suit.

Under some statutes the time of filing the affidavit for attachment is made, for all legal purposes, the date of the commencement of the suit, and a præcipe is not required.[67]

(b) On Filing Complaint, Declaration, or Petition; or Notice of Motion

The writ may issue, under some practice, on the filing of the complaint, or on such filing and issuance of a summons, or on service of a notice of motion for judgment.

Under some statutes the action is deemed to be commenced when the complaint, declaration, or petition is filed,[68] although some of the decisions hold that it is also necessary that a summons be issued thereon with a bona fide intent that it shall be served.[69]

The filing of a defective petition may institute the action within the contemplation of the rule, provided it is susceptible of amendment curing the defects.[70]

Where action is to be begun by notice of motion for judgment, an attachment may not issue, it has been held, after a mere filing of such notice without service thereof.[71]

(c) On Issuance or Service of Summons

aa. In general

bb. What constitutes issuance of summons

cc. Necessity of service of summons

aa. In General

In some jurisdictions the writ may issue at or after issuance of the summons, but not before.

In a number of states the action is deemed to be commenced when the summons is issued,[72] and will be deemed pending for the purposes of the issuance of the writ, if the summons and writ issue simultaneously;[73] but the summons must be issued at or before the issuance of the attachment,[74] and a writ of attachment issued before due issuance of the summons is null and void.[75]

bb. What Constitutes Issuance of Summons

Delivery to the officer charged with service of a summons is necessary and sufficient to constitute issuance of the summons warranting subsequent or contemporaneous issuance of the writ of attachment.

Summons will be deemed issued when it is made out and placed in the hands of an officer authorized to serve it with a bona fide intent to have it served,[76] and delivery to the officer charged with the duty of service has been held essential to issuance of a summons within the rule making issuance of the summons prerequisite to issuance of an attachment.[77]

cc. Necessity of Service of Summons

Generally speaking, service of the summons is not a condition precedent to issuance of a writ of attachment, but may be a condition subsequent.

While the granting of the warrant of attachment may be made either before or after the service of the summons,[78] and it is not necessary that the summons should be actually served by the officer or other person before the issuance of the writ of attachment,[79] nevertheless, to render the writ of attachment valid there must be either service of the summons or delivery to the officer with intent to have it served;[80] and it has been said that the jurisdiction acquired without service of the summons is subject to a condition subsequent that service of summons thereafter be made, and that in default of such subsequent service the action and attachment will fail.[81]

It has also been provided in some states, that a personal service of such summons shall be made, or publication thereof commenced, within a specified time after the issuance of the same, and if publication has been or is thereafter commenced, that the service must be made complete by the continuance thereof,[82] and the attachment fails if service is not so made or publication so commenced or continued,[83] or if the summons or the service thereof is set aside as irregular, and no stay is granted pending an appeal therefrom and no new service is made.[84]

c. Interval Allowed between Filing Affidavit and Issue of Writ

A reasonable time may properly elapse between the making and filing of the affidavit and the issuance of the writ or warrant of attachment.

The affidavit should be made contemporaneously with the issuing of the writ or warrant of attachment, or at a reasonable time prior thereto.[85] Reasonable time should be allowed within which to transmit the affidavit to the place where it is to be used,[86] but such a delay between the making of the affidavit and the issue of the writ as to cast a suspicion on the verity of the affidavit, or lead to the suspicion that the grounds stated in the affidavit for asking that the attachment issue had ceased to exist, will warrant the quashing of the attachment.[87]

In the absence of a contrary statute, the writ may issue in vacation.

In the absence of statutory prohibition, the writ may issue in a pending action in vacation as well as during a term of court.[88]

Issuance of the writ of attachment on Sundays will be considered in § 42 of the title Sunday [60 C.J. p 1139 note 64–p 1140 notes 65–67; 6 C.J. p 179 notes 29–31], and issuance of the writ on holidays will be taken up in § 5 of the title Holidays [29 C.J. p 765 note 45; 6 C.J. p 179 notes 29–31].

§ 183. Issuance and Record

a. Issuance
b Record

a. Issuance

While issuance of the writ is, ordinarily, a judicial act, on compliance with statutory prequisites the writ issues as a matter of right. The writ is issued when delivered to the officer for execution. Lack of notice of issuance for protection of third persons cannot avail defendant.

statutory requirements it will issue as a matter of right.[90]

A writ of attachment is not issued when sealed and signed by its author, the clerk,[91] but is issued when, and only when, delivered to the sheriff or similar officer for execution.[92]

The notice of issuance of a writ of attachment required to be given by the clerk is intended for the protection and benefit of other creditors of defendant, and a failure to give the notice is not available to defendant in attachment, and does not enable him to avoid the attachment or subsequent execution sale thereunder.[93]

b. Record

While provision is ordinarily made for recording attachments, the writ has been held not an "instrument" within the meaning of general recording acts.

Provision is, ordinarily, made for the recording of attachments, although it has been held that an attachment is not an "instrument" within the meaning of statutes affording prior rights to one acquiring title or lien by "instrument" first duly recorded.[94] Where an attachment is properly issued on the filing of a sufficient affidavit and bond, and property is taken thereunder, the lien of attachment is not lost by failure of the probate judge or a justice of the peace to make proper docket entries of the issuance of such order of attachment.[95]

§ 184. Form and Requisites

The form of the writ should comply with the requirements of applicable statutes or rules of court.

The writ should comply with the requirements of the statute in matters of form[96] and should show on its face by what officer it was issued.[97]

It has been held that an attachment writ was not insufficient in form because a blank form of a trustee writ was used, although the name of the trustee was not inserted,[98] and that a writ of "trustee process" may be sufficient as a valid attachment where no service is made on the trustee named therein.[99]

The summons and the order of attachment may be embodied in the same writ.[1]

Where the form of a warrant is controlled by rules of court, without mandatory statutory requirement, a harmless irregularity in form will not invalidate the warrant.[2]

§ 185. —— Style of Writ

The writ should run in the name of the state or people; defects in such respects are not amendable according to some authorities, although they may be amended according to other authorities.

The writ should run in the name of the state or people,[3] and, in some jurisdictions, a defect in this respect is held to be fatal, the writ being regarded as void ab initio;[4] but in other jurisdictions an amendment in this respect is allowed.[5]

Amendment of record

Where the clerk fails to embody in the record an affidavit on which a writ of attachment issued, the record will be amended so as to include the omitted affidavit.—Mitchell v. Hyster, 7 Ohio 257.

Copy of an attachment, with the sheriff's indorsement of a levy, on file in the office of the register of deeds, is not proof that an attachment has been issued, with the necessary affidavits and undertaking attached so as to authorize it to be executed.—Stanhilber v. Graves, 73 N.W. 48, 97 Wis. 515.

Right to entry of record not shown

Under Cir.Ct.Rules, rule 2, enacted pursuant to Rev.St. § 918 (U.S.Comp.St.[1901] p. 685), plaintiff, causing the issuance on October 14 of a writ of attachment made returnable December 6 following, while the court had two terms commencing on the last Tuesday of February and the third Tuesday of October, was not entitled, as a matter of right, to have his writ entered while the October term was in session, and, in the absence of an agreement of the parties or special order of the court, the clerk may refuse to enter it on the record and to enter judgment for plaintiff.—Kinney v. Plymouth Rock Squab Co., (Mass.) 214 F. 766, 131 C.C.A. 178, error dismissed 36 S.Ct. 723, 241 U.S. 653, 60 L.Ed. 1223.

§ 186. —— To Whom Directed

The writ should be addressed to a person, usually an officer, legally authorized to execute it. A writ addressed to no one is a nullity. Errors in respect of the officer designated may, however, be cured by amendment or by service by the proper officer.

As a rule, the writ should be directed to a particular officer or class of officers authorized by law to levy the same, and, according to the varying statutes of different jurisdictions, should be directed to the sheriff,[6] or a constable[7] of the county where defendant's property is located,[8] or to any sheriff[9] or constable[10] of the state.[11]

An error in this respect, however, has been held to be curable by amendment,[12] and it has also been held that an improper direction of the writ is immaterial if it was in fact executed by a proper officer.[13]

When the writ is directed to one specially authorized, the conditions and circumstances giving special jurisdiction and authority for such direction should affirmatively appear.[14]

A writ addressed to no one is void.[15]

§ 187. —— Description of Parties

The writ should contain the names of the parties, but need not state their ages or residences. Irregularities in respect of the names may be amended, or disregarded if slight, although, where neither party is named, the writ is fatally defective.

The writ should give the names of the parties to the suit,[16] but a slight variance in names may be disregarded under the rule of idem sonans,[17] a writ substantially indicating defendant is sufficient.[18] Also, amendments supplying the names of parties inadvertently omitted or correcting the names of parties have been liberally allowed by the courts, particularly where the substantial rights of the parties to the suit have not been thereby affected,[19] although, where the name of neither party is specified, the writ is fatally defective.[20]

Residence and majority. The writ need not state that plaintiff is a resident of the state[21] or that defendant is an adult.[22]

§ 188. —— Recitals in General

Minor defects in respect of recitals in the body of the writ will not invalidate it.

A writ running in the name of the state and debtor, when issued, read "The People of the United States," instead of "The People of the State of New York," was properly signed by a judge of the state supreme court, and was afterward corrected by permission of that court, it was held that the writ needed no caption, in any event, but that if one had been required, the error was so palpable that the writ could be amended by a subsequent order of the court—Castriotis v. signed by the clerk of a district court in a named county of such state is sufficient, although the body of the writ does not recite that such county was in such state.[23]

It is, ordinarily, proper but not essential for the writ to recite the filing of the affidavit and bond and the order for issuance. Statutes requiring a writ issued without bond to recite such fact have been construed as merely directory.

In the absence of statutory requirement, it is not necessary to recite the filing of the affidavit required by law[24] or the execution or filing of a bond,[25] although it has been said to be good form to recite these matters;[26] neither is it necessary for the writ to recite the order for its issuance,[27] or to show on its face by what officer it was allowed.[28]

Statutory provisions to the effect that, if an attachment is issued without bond, such fact must be indorsed on the writ have been construed as merely directory, and not mandatory, in the sense that failure to do so will nullify the writ.[29]

§ 190. —— Recitals as to Action in Which Writ Issued

An ancillary writ of attachment should contain recitals which identify the suit in which it is issued and show that the suit is pending

An ancillary writ of attachment must refer to, describe, and identify the suit in aid of which it issues, so as to show unmistakably on its face that it forms an adjunct to that particular proceeding.[30] It should recite that an action has been commenced[31] and is pending[32] by plaintiff against defendant,[33] although the latter recital has been held unnecessary in some states,[34] the nature of the action,[35] the tribunal in which it is pending,[36] and, where required by statute, that the cause of action is just.[37]

§ 191. —— Recitals as to Amount of Claim

The writ should recite the amount of the claim. Irregularities as to such recital are amendable unless jurisdictional.

The writ should state the amount of the claim for which it is issued;[38] but where the amount claimed is omitted or erroneously stated, the writ is, ordinarily, amendable in that respect,[39] unless the amount recited is in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, in which event the writ is void and may not be amended.[40]

The purpose of stipulating the amount in the writ is to fix the liability of the sheriff, to designate the amount of property to be seized, and to protect the interests of innocent third parties.[41]

§ 192. —— Recitals as to Grounds of Attachment

The writ should recite the grounds of attachment. Recital of two or more consistent grounds is proper, but grounds should not be stated in the alternative. Defective recitals in the writ may be aided by reference to the affidavit, and have been held amendable irregularities.

The writ should state one or more of the statutory grounds on which it is granted,[42] and is sufficient in this respect if the words employed are substantially synonymous with those of the statute,[43] but an insufficient recital has been held an irregularity only[44] In the absence of statutory inhibition, the court has inherent power to permit the amendment of an inadvertent error in the statement of the grounds,[45] and a defective statement in the writ may be aided by reference to the affidavit.[46]

Stating two or more grounds. There is no objection to stating two or more grounds, provided they are not inconsistent[47]

Alternative statements. The grounds of attachment should not be stated in the alternative,[48] except where the statement presents merely different phases of the same state of facts constituting, in effect, but a single ground;[49] but a writ containing such statements is voidable only and good until vacated,[50] and the court has power to correct an inadvertent error in stating in the alternative grounds which actually existed[51]

§ 193. —— Commands to Officer

a. As to attaching
b. As to summoning defendant
c. As to return

a. As to Attaching

The writ should direct the officer to attach the property of the defendant, designating the amount but not the particular property to be taken.

The writ should contain a command to the officer to attach the property or estate of defendant,[52] and, in accordance with the rule stated in § 191, should designate the amount or value of the property to be attached,[53] although it should not, ordinarily, designate the particular property to be taken.[54]

b. As to Summoning Defendant

Under some practice the writ should or must direct the officer to summon the defendant.

Where the statute so requires the writ should contain a direction to the officer to summon defendant,[55] and an omission of this direction has been held fatal[56]

c. As to Return

The writ should direct the officer as to its return, including the time and place thereof Defects in such respects may render the writ void or be curable by amendment, in accordance with local practice.

The writ should contain proper directions to the officer as to the return of the writ, and, where required should specify the return day[57] and the place of return.[58]

Statutes regulating the time at which a writ of attachment should be made returnable have been construed as mandatory, so that an error in respect of naming the return day has been held to render the writ void,[59] but, as a rule, it is considered

Election
Under statutes requiring a writ to be returned on the first return day after the issuing thereof, and subseas rendering it only voidable,[60] so that an error in this respect,[61] or in respect of the court or officer to which, or the place where, the return is to be made,[62] may be cured by amendment, which subject of amendment will be further considered in § 198 infra.

Where the statutes do not require the writ to be made returnable to the next term of court, but permit it to be made returnable on any date specified prior thereto, such writ may be made returnable instanter.[63]

§ 194. —— Description of Property

In the absence of statutory requirement the writ need not describe the property to be attached. Where requisite, the description is sufficient which will enable the officer to find personalty, or would be sufficient to pass title to realty.

In the absence of any statutory requirement the writ need not describe the property which is to be attached,[64] and, where a description is required, it is sufficient, in the case of personalty, if it will enable the officer to find the property by the exercise of reasonable diligence,[65] or, in the case of land, if it would be sufficient to pass the land in a grant by the owner.[66]

One purpose of requiring a description is to notify all persons who are or may become interested in the property that the same is under attachment.[67]

§ 195. —— Date, Teste, Signature, and Seal

a. Date
b. Teste, or "attestation" of process
c. Signature
d. Seal

a. Date

The writ should show its date of issue, although defects in such respect are amendable.

The writ should show the date of its issuance,[68] but this need not appear in any particular place,[69] and an error[70] or an omission[71] in this respect will not render the writ void, but may be cured by amendment, which subject of amendment will be treated generally in § 198 infra.

b. Teste, or "Attestation" of Process

The writ should be tested as required by law, although irregularities in this respect are amendable.

The writ should be tested as required by law,[72] but, if not properly tested, may be amended.[73]

Attestation of the writ by the clerk as clerk of the district court of a particular county and state has been held sufficient, although there was more than one district court in such county, where there was only one clerk for such courts.[74]

c. Signature

Judicial notice taken of facts

A writ of attachment was not required to be attested by the clerk as clerk of the seventy-fourth judicial district, McLennan County, in view of Rev.St. art. 240 Acts (1893) c. 46, and Acts (1915) c. 8 (Vernon Civ.St.Annot.Suppl.[1918] art. 30 subds. 19, 54, 74), since the court takes judicial notice that McLennan County has three district courts and but one clerk who performs all duties pertaining to clerkship of each of such courts—Bruyere v. Liberty Nat. Bank of Waco, (Tex.Civ.App.) 262 S.W. 844.

(1) By Issuing Officer

The writ should be signed by the issuing officer. An unsigned writ has been held void, although other authorities view defects of this character as subject to amendment or waiver.

The writ should be signed by the officer by whom it is issued,[75] whether this act is performed by a judge[76] or the clerk of court.[77] It has been held that a defect in respect of the signing does not render the writ void,[78] but such defect may be waived[79] or cured by amendment,[80] although other authority regards an unsigned writ as void and not properly the subject of amendment.[81]

(2) By Plaintiff's Attorney

A writ unsigned by plaintiff's attorney has been held void under regulatory statutes, although some authority views the defect as amendable.

It is sometimes required by statute that the writ should be signed by plaintiff's attorney.[82] This requirement has been construed as mandatory,[83] and the omission of his signature has been held to be a fatal defect;[84] although it has also been held that omission of the attorney's signature may be remedied by amendment,[85] and that the indorsement of the writ by plaintiff's attorney may be made after motion to quash.[86]

The authorities agree that the writ should bear the seal of the issuing court, or a private seal if none exists, but differ as to whether omission of the seal is a fatal defect or a mere irregularity.

The seal of the court from which the writ of attachment issues, or a private seal where no court seal exists, should be affixed to the writ,[87] and it has been held that the omission of the seal renders the writ void,[88] although there is also authority for the view that an omission of, or failure properly to affix, the seal is a mere irregularity[89] which may be waived[90] or cured by amendment.[91]

§ 196. —— Variance between Writ and Other Papers

a. In general

b As to amount of claim

a. In General

A material variance between the writ, affidavits, and pleadings may be fatal; but an immaterial variance will not invalidate the writ.

A material variance between the writ, affidavit, and pleadings, either as to grounds,[92] cause of action,[93] or description of parties,[94] is fatal, if the objection is properly raised; but an immaterial variance due to clerical oversight will not invalidate the writ.[95]

A writ of attachment may be sued out in the individual name of a plaintiff whose declaration in attachment was filed in his trade name.[96]

b. As to Amount of Claim

A writ for an amount exceeding plaintiff's claim is voidable, although a writ for a less amount is unobjectionable. The writ should conform to the complaint in respect of the amounts demanded from different defendants, but need not conform to amendments in the complaint made after issuance of the writ.

A variance as to the amount of the claim affords

Failure to name writ
Where defendants urged that a sheriff's seizure of property as on attachment fell because the writ under which he levied was not designated a writ of attachment and did not direct him to attach, in denying the contention the court held that the alleged variance was not material because, if the sheriff was authorized to take possession of the property under the writ, it made no material difference what name, "attachment" or otherwise, was given to his act in seizing the property—Brinkerhoff v. Russ, 3 La App. 723

96. Dunn & McCarthy v. Pinkston, 170 S E 922, 47 Ga App. 514, reversed on other grounds 175 S E. 4, 179 Ga 31, conformed to 175 S. E. 663, 49 Ga App. 408.

no ground for setting aside the attachment where the amount stated in the writ is less than that demanded in the complaint or summons, for in such case defendant cannot be prejudiced,[97] and where the writ and complaint corresponded, although the amount named in the affidavit was smaller, it was held that a motion to quash the writ was properly denied where plaintiff amended his bond to correspond to the larger amount,[98] but a writ for an amount in excess of plaintiff's claim is improper[99] and voidable[1] as to the excess.[2] A slight discrepancy in either direction between the amount stated in the warrant and that contained in the complaint will not affect, in a collateral proceeding, the validity of a lien secured under the attachment.[3]

The writ need not conform to the complaint in respect of amendments as to amount made in the complaint after issuance of the writ.[4]

Where the complaint demands different amounts of different defendants, the writ should conform to the complaint in such respect[5]

Minor or nonprejudicial defects will not invalidate the writ. Defendant's appearance may cure irregularities, but not jurisdictional defects.

As a general rule clerical errors or omissions readily supplied will not vitiate an otherwise valid writ,[6] nor will a writ otherwise proper be invalidated by irregularities of a nonprejudicial character.[7]

Appearance as waiver. Informalities will be waived by appearance and answer,[8] although the general appearance of defendant will not cure the improper issuance of a writ of attachment where the defect is of a jurisdictional character.[9]

Particular defects. After issue made and trial begun on the merits of a case, it is too late for an objection to the petition or attachment for want of verification.[10] Where a statute provided that an attachment might issue where defendant kept himself concealed with intent to avoid the service of a summons, and another statute directed that a summons should accompany a warrant of attachment, it was held that, where an attachment was issued on such ground, an objection that the summons was issued with the attachment, and that, therefore, it could not be truthfully said that defendant concealed himself with intent to avoid the service of such summons, was insufficient as affecting the validity of the attachment.[11]

The institution of an action before the claim is due, and the issuing and levying of an attachment without obtaining an order therefor, constitute a substantial defect of which junior attachment creditors may take advantage,[12] but where a mistake in a writ of attachment was cured by the statute of jeofails, and land was attached and extended on in said suit, it was held that the judgment could not be contested by a grantee of defendant, in an action brought to recover the land,

Interest

The fact that the complaint prayed six per cent interest, the warrant of attachment prayed interest, and the notice of levy did not mention interest, did not create a variance—Kelm v Lolland, 228 N.W 420, 59 N D 18—6 C J p 190 note 42 [b]

Irregular statement as to court in which action is pending

Where anyone examining the certificate of attachment could readily have ascertained whether the action was pending in the superior court or the court of common pleas, a defect in not striking out of the printed form the words "common pleas court" did not make the attachment invalid—Joseph v. Donovan, 157 A 638, 114 Conn 79 except by showing collusion between the parties[13]

Waiver of other particular defects has been heretofore considered, and section 184 and the sections following it should be consulted for cases, if any, on waiver of defects as to the matters specified in such sections.

§ 198. —— Amendments

A voidable writ is amendable; a void writ is not. Whether amendment may cut off intermediate rights of third parties is a matter as to which the authorities are not in entire accord.

In some states the statutes expressly provide for amendment of the writ, where legal grounds for the attachment existed at the time of its issue; and even in the absence of statutes expressly authorizing defects in form to be corrected the courts have been very liberal in granting applications to amend mere clerical errors and omissions,[14] although where the writ is absolutely void, it cannot be the subject of amendment.[15]

It has been held by a number of authorities that an amendment cannot be permitted to cut off intermediate rights acquired by third persons,[16] while other authorities hold that the same right to amend exists against creditors attaching after the issue of a defective writ as against the original debtor.[17]

The propriety of amendments to correct defects in respect of the particular matters of form and requisites of the writ there considered has been taken up in §§ 185–195 supra.

§ 199. Simultaneous Writs

Simultaneous writs against defendant may be issued to attach his property in different counties, and it has been held that this may be done without additional affidavits and undertakings

When defendant has property in several counties separate writs may be issued simultaneously to each county,[18] without additional affidavits and undertakings[19]

§ 200. Successive or Alias Writs

a. In general
b. Dissolution of first or succeeding writ

a. In General

Under some practice successive writs may issue where the prior writ was ineffectual, without a new affidavit or bond, although under other practice plaintiff's only remedy in such case is an alias writ issued on a new oath and bond; and still other authorities broadly deny the right to issue successive or alias writs. It has also been held that separate writs may issue in the same suit if based on different grounds, and that separate writs may issue against different property of the same defendant separately sued by different plaintiffs.

In some jurisdictions where the first writ fails through some defect, or where an insufficient amount of property is attached thereunder, successive writs may issue to the same or different counties[20] without filing a new affidavit or bond, provided the affidavit and bond supporting the first writ are not defective;[21] although it has also been held that, where the original citation and writ of attachment after defective service are returned to the clerk's office and duly filed, they cannot again be issued and served, and that to correct the defect in service plaintiff's remedy is to apply to the court for an alias writ, which can issue only on making a new oath, securing a new order, and making a new bond;[22] and there are authorities which have denied the right to issue alias or successive writs[23]

Where there is nothing to show that the first writ of attachment was defective, or that it did not establish or fix the lien, issuance of a second writ of attachment in the same suit against the same property does not render the first writ void so as to permit intervening rights[24]

The existence of an attachment on certain property in a suit brought by a creditor of the defendant is no bar to the right of another creditor to institute an independent suit against the same defendant and have property attached under the writ issued therein which is not subject to the lien of the writ in the prior suit[25]

Separate writs based on different grounds. It has been held that there may be in the same suit more than one affidavit and attachment based on different grounds.[26]

Where, however, the original complaint or affidavit was against a number of defendants jointly, a separate attachment against one of the defendants on a separate affidavit for an attachment against such defendant, introducing a new and independent cause of action against such defendant alone, on the individual debt of such defendant, with which the other defendants were not concerned, cannot be sustained, since the separate affidavit cannot be considered as an amendment nor as an addition to the original.[27]

Lost writ. While the loss of an original writ of attachment does not require that plaintiff should begin new proceedings, where he elects to do so rather than to have duplicates of the lost papers issued, he must be held to have abandoned the original proceedings and a second writ issued under such circumstances is invalid in the absence of a new affidavit, order, or bond.[28]

b. Dissolution of First or Succeeding Writ

After dissolution of the original writ on the merits, a second writ will not issue on the same facts, although a second writ may be allowed on new grounds. A quashal of the original writ does not necessitate dissolution of an alias writ and, after dissolution of an attachment for insufficient bond, the filing of a new bond may warrant the issuance of an alias.

Where a writ of attachment has been dissolved by the court after a hearing on the merits of the application, an alias writ, based on substantially the same state of facts, whether applied for to the same or another court, will not be granted,[29] but

After levy on property beyond jurisdiction

Where the first attachment was void because the property levied on was beyond the court's jurisdiction, a second attachment could issue and hold the property when properly levied on and within the court's jurisdiction—Welch v. Welch, 238 N W. 81, 212 Iowa 1245

Prior attachment not entered in court

A preexisting attachment of land, made on a writ never entered in court, although undischarged on the record of the registry of deeds, was no bar to subsequent attachment and sale, through which the title of petitioner for registration of title to the land is derived—Solovicos v. Different counties

A second and successive warrant of attachment against debtor's property in one county was properly granted on the same bond and complaint on which a previous warrant was granted against defendant's property in another county—Triangle Radio Supply Co v. New order requisite

After release of his attachment by his attorneys, plaintiff could take out a new attachment, and so use the affidavit a second time, but it would be under an independent order.—American Rattan & Reed Mfg Co. v. Handel-Maatschappij Moraux & Co, 185 N Y S 480, 194 App Div. 90.

a second writ may issue on an amended affidavit showing new or different grounds for attachment.[30]

An alias writ will not be dissolved where the first writ was quashed for a mere irregularity, although the second was issued on the same affidavit and bond,[31] and, where an attachment is set aside for insufficiency of the bond, an alias writ may issue on the filing of a sufficient bond without the filing of a new petition or affidavit.[32]

VI. LEVY OF ATTACHMENT

There can be no attachment without a levy or its equivalent

A valid attachment requires an order thereof to be levied,[33] and where no property of defendant in attachment is seized by direct levy or by garnishment issued on the attachment, there is no attachment.[34]

§ 202. —— To Acquisition of Jurisdiction

In the absence of personal service, levy or its equivalent is essential to jurisdiction of the court in an attachment proceeding. A simulated levy on property not claimed by defendant is ineffectual.

In an attachment suit, where there is no personal service on defendant, a levy or its equivalent is essential to give the court jurisdiction to proceed to judgment,[35] and a simulated levy on property to which defendant has no claim of right will not have the effect of constructive notice to him so as to authorize the court to proceed to judgment.[36]

Levy is essential to acquisition of an attachment lien.

In order that a creditor may acquire a lien by virtue of his attachment, it is not alone sufficient that a writ of attachment has been regularly issued by a competent authority, or even placed in the hands of an officer, but there must be an actual and valid levy on the property of the debtor,[37] and, until such levy has been made, the attachment creditor has no rights in his debtor's property.[38]

§ 204. Who May Levy, and Basis and Duration of Authority

a. In general
b. Authority to levy

a. In General

The writ should be executed by a duly authorized officer, and service by an unauthorized officer is void. A private individual cannot levy an attachment.

The writ must be executed by the executive officer of the court, or of some court of similar jurisdiction in another county or district, to whom it is directed, and whose duty it is to obey the mandate contained in the process,[39] and service of the writ by an officer not legally authorized is void.[40]

A private individual cannot make a levy under a writ of attachment.[41]

b. Authority to Levy

The authority of the levying officer is based on the writ, which should be in his possession at the time of levy. His authority to levy begins with delivery of the writ and ends with its return, or arrival of the return day.

The authority of the levying officer is derived from, and dependent on, the execution and transmission to him of the writ of attachment,[42] and he must be prepared, if his right is challenged, to produce his authority. If he cannot do so, he is a trespasser and may be resisted as such.[43] It would seem, however, that the officer need not actually have the writ in his possession at the time of levying, but that it will be sufficient if he has it within his control.[44]

Duration of authority. The authority of the officer to whom the writ of attachment has been delivered to levy continues from his actual receipt of the writ[45] until the return day, or until he has actually returned it.[46]

§ 205. —— Particular Officers

a. Sheriffs and their deputies
b. Constables and their deputies
c. Coroners
d. Town or city marshals
e. Elisors
f. Indifferent persons specially deputed

a. Sheriffs and Their Deputies

The sheriff or his deputy may generally levy an attachment, although he may be restricted to property within his own county, and has been denied the right to levy a writ directed to a constable.

Attachments may usually be levied by the sheriff of a county,[47] and in certain cases, as where the attachment is for more than a certain amount or returnable to certain courts, only the sheriff or his deputy is authorized to levy.[48] The power of a sheriff to levy an attachment may also be exercised by a properly appointed and authorized deputy of such sheriff,[49] although it has been held that a sheriff cannot ratify the illegal act of one assuming to act as his deputy and making a levy in his name without his authority.[50]

A writ directed to a constable cannot lawfully be levied by the sheriff,[51] unless the statute authorized him to execute such process.[52]

Territorial restrictions. It has been held that a sheriff may not levy under an attachment on personal property outside of his own county,[53] although where a county is divided into different districts, a writ addressed to the sheriff of the county and sued out in one district may properly be executed in a different district of such county.[54]

b. Constables and Their Deputies

The right of constables to levy attachments is, ordinarily, restricted to those returnable to particular courts or involving claims of limited amounts. A special or deputy constable may or may not be authorized to levy in accordance with applicable statutory provisions.

Attachments may in certain cases be levied by a constable,[55] but, as a rule, their power in this respect is confined to attachments issuing from, and returnable to, certain courts,[56] and to attachments for sums not exceeding a certain amount fixed by statute,[57] and a levy by a constable in a case to which his power does not extend is void.[58]

A deputy constable may, it has been held, execute a domestic attachment, although it is directed to the constable,[59] although it has been held that code provisions authorizing an attachment in certain cases by a constable, refer only to a regular constable and not to a special or unbonded deputy constable.[60]

c. Coroners

The coroner may serve an attachment in an action wherein the sheriff is defendant.

In some jurisdictions it is expressly provided by statute that, in actions where the sheriff is defendant, the service of the attachment shall be made by a coroner, and service in such case by the sheriff's deputy is unauthorized and defective.[61]

d. Town or City Marshals

Under statute a town or city marshal may be authorized to levy an attachment on property within his own county; although he may not do so in the absence of statutory or special authority.

Under some statutes a town or city marshal is authorized to levy an attachment, although his right to levy on goods outside his own county has been denied.[62] Where, however, the statute does not confer power to levy an attachment upon that officer, a levy by him creates no lien, unless he is specially appointed for that purpose [63]

e. Elisors

An elisor or special officer appointed by the court may serve the writ where there is no sheriff nor coroner in the county, or where the attachment is against the sheriff himself.

In case there should be neither a sheriff nor a coroner in the county, a writ of attachment may be served by an elisor or elizor, or special officer appointed by the court,[64] and an elisor may be appointed to serve an attachment against the sheriff.[65]

f. Indifferent Persons Specially Deputed

Under some practice an indifferent person appointed by magistrate may levy an attachment. While having the powers of a sheriff in such respect, he should show his authority on demand.

In some states it is held that a magistrate may appoint an indifferent person to levy an attachment.[66] A person so appointed has all the powers of a sheriff in the premises, but must show his authority to act, if questioned.[67]

§ 206. —— Disqualification by Interest

Interest disqualifies an officer from levying an attachment.

Where an officer is interested in a case, he is disqualified from levying an attachment therein,[68] and this disqualification extends to a deputy sheriff, both in cases where his principal is interested and in cases where he is individually interested [69]

§ 207. Duty to Levy

An officer, or one becoming an officer pro hac vice, is under a duty to levy under a writ of attachment placed in his hands.

It is the duty of the officer, after the writ has been placed in his hands for execution, to proceed thereunder and complete its execution with all reasonable diligence and dispatch,[70] without inquiring into the regularity of the proceeding whereon the writ is grounded [71]

Officer pro hac vice. A private person duly authorized to serve an attachment, and who accepts the authorization and writ, becomes an officer pro hac vice under a duty to levy the attachment without further specific instruction to do so.[72]

§ 208. —— On Property Subsequently Acquired or Discovered

The officer is under a duty to levy on property of the defendant acquired or discovered subsequently to the issuance of the writ and before the return thereof.

Although defendant may have had no property at one time, yet if he has acquired property subsequently and before the return of the writ, or if further search develops property belonging to him, it is the duty of the officer to attach the same.[73]

§ 209. —— Where Bond Given to Prevent Levy

Where authorized by statute or otherwise, the officer may accept defendant's bond in lieu of levying the attachment.

In some states it is expressly provided by statute that the officer is not bound to levy the attachment where defendant gives a proper undertaking, but may instead take such undertaking,[74] and in others the practice of giving a release bond to prevent an actual levy exists, although not expressly authorized by statute.[75]

§ 210. Time of Levy

a. In general
b. Seizure before issuance of writ or service of summons
c. When property pursued into another county

a. In General

An officer proceeding with due diligence may levy an attachment at any time within the period prescribed by law, although not after the return date nor after judgment.

In the absence of instructions for an immediate levy the officer has the right to make the same at any time within the period prescribed by law[76] He must, however, act with reasonable diligence in making the levy,[77] and it must be made before expiration of the time for the return of the writ,[78] and before judgment has been entered.[79]

b. Seizure before Issuance of Writ or Service of Summons

A levy is premature and void if made before issuance of the writ. Ordinarily the levy may precede service of the summons, although the contrary has been held where the defendant was a nonresident.

A levy may not be made under an attachment before the writ has been executed and issued.[80]

The seizure of property on an attachment writ may, it has been held, be made before the service of the summons,[81] the same being so far in the nature of a proceeding in rem as to be a basis of a subsequent service by publication upon a nonresident.[82] It has also been held, however, in the absence of a statute conferring jurisdiction upon the particular court to attach the property of a nonresident, that if defendant is a nonresident, and has not been served with a summons at the time of a levy upon the property, the court at that time has no jurisdiction either of the subject matter or of the person of defendant, the writ of attachment has no validity, and the levy under it is wholly void and unauthorized.[83]

c. When Property Pursued into Another County

An officer pursuing property into another county under statutory authorization must levy his attachment thereon within the period prescribed.

Where the officer is authorized by statute to pursue and attach property in an adjoining county within a certain time after its removal the levy must be made within the specified time therefor.[84]

§ 211. Order of Levy

The officer should serve or levy writs in the order of their delivery to him.

Where several writs against the same defendant are placed in an officer's hands, it is his duty to serve or levy them in the order in which they were delivered to him for that purpose,[85] and in the absence of any showing to the contrary it will be presumed that the sheriff levied first those attachments which came into his hands first[86]

§ 212. Rights and Powers of Levying Officer

a. To seize and hold property
b. To pursue property

a. To Seize and Hold Property

The levying officer may seize and hold the goods pending inventory and appraisal, but should do no more than safely keep them subject to judicial direction. The officer need not levy on personalty before seizing realty.

An officer having an attachment in his hands has the right to seize the goods of the debtor and hold them until an inventory and appraisal can be made according to law;[87] but beyond this he has no power to do any other act in relation to the goods seized than simply to keep them safely, subject to the direction of the judge granting the process.[88] The officer is not required to levy first on personal property before seizing realty.[89]

b. To Pursue Property

Under statutory permission a levying officer may pursue personalty into another county and attach it there.

It is sometimes expressly provided by statute that an officer to whom a writ of attachment is directed may, if a defendant is in the act of removing any personal property, pursue and take the same in any county in the state and return it to the county from which the writ issued.[90]

§ 213. —— To What Property Levy Confined in General

a. Property of defendant generally
b Commingled goods
c. Goods in possession of third person

a. Property of Defendant Generally

Under a writ of attachment the levying officer may seize only the property of the defendant.

A writ of attachment gives no authority to the levying officer to seize or detain goods other than the goods of defendant.[91] Accordingly, the officer is not bound to levy upon property unless he has probable and reasonable cause to believe that the same belongs to defendant,[92] must determine at his peril what property is that of defendant,[93] and may, where he has any reason to doubt that the goods belong to the debtor, insist that the creditor point out property belonging to the debtor and indemnify him against liability.[94]

b. Commingled Goods

The levying officer should try to distinguish the defendant's goods from others with which they are commingled, but if unable to do so may retain the whole pending a third person's identification of goods owned by him.

Where the goods of defendant and those of a stranger are commingled it is the duty of the officer, if possible, to distinguish them before attaching,[95] and not attach the whole of them without making the inquiry.[96] If, however, the officer after making reasonable inquiry is unable to distinguish the goods, he may retain the whole until the owner identifies and points out the articles belonging to him.[97]

c. Goods in Possession of Third Person

An officer should investigate the ownership of property in possession of a third person before attaching it as that of the defendant.

Possession of personal property being presumptive evidence of title, the law makes no presumption in the officer's favor where he makes a levy upon property in the actual possession of a stranger to the suit under a writ running solely against defendant therein.[98] The officer is bound to take notice of the fact that the property is not in possession of the debtor, and to inquire of those in whose possession he finds the property for whom they hold it,[99] and both he and the creditor are affected by any knowledge that would be gained by such inquiry.[1]

§ 214. —— Effect of Specific Directions to Officer

a From creditor
b From debtor

a. From Creditor

An officer should follow the creditor's lawful directions respecting attachment, although such directions do not restrict his legal authority to attach sufficient property to secure the demand.

An officer receiving specific directions from the attaching creditor as to the attachment of property is bound to follow such directions if he can lawfully do so,[2] and a creditor, after suing out a writ of attachment, has the right to have the writ levied upon such property as he may specifically designate, and no other, although the writ may instruct the officer to seize and take into his possession all the property of defendant found in the officer's jurisdiction.[3] But, while special directions may justify the officer for not going beyond them,[4] it has been held that such directions do not deprive him of the legal authority to obey the general command to attach sufficient to secure the demand, if he has opportunity so to do and chooses to avail himself thereof.[5]

b. From Debtor

According to some authorities the debtor has the personal right to select the property to be attached

In some jurisdictions the debtor may point out property to be seized under attachment, but this right is personal to him, and no complaint in that particular can be made by plaintiff.[6] Under the procedure in other states it is not necessary for the officer to call on defendant or his agent to point out the property to be levied on.[7]

The officer may use necessary force to levy an attachment.

In levying an attachment the officer has the right to use such force as may be necessary to the performance of his duty under the law.[8]

§ 216. —— Breaking or Entering Buildings and Opening Receptacles

a. Breaking or entering buildings
b Opening receptacles

a. Breaking or Entering Buildings

The officer may not break into a dwelling, or buildings physically connected therewith, to attach property therein, although he may enter peaceably for such purpose; and in the case of other structures a forcible entrance may be lawful. The officer may retain possession of premises long enough to inventory and remove attached goods.

As a rule an officer may not break the outer door of a dwelling house for the purpose of levying an attachment,[9] but, if the entry is made without force, peaceably, and permissively, he may proceed to levy upon goods within the house[10] Where, however, goods are within a store, warehouse, or any building other than a dwelling house, it would seem that the officer may, if necessary, make a forcible entrance in order to levy the writ after admission has been demanded and refused,[11] although a shed and barn attached to dwelling house have been held part thereof as bearing on the right of entering for attachment.[12]

Possession of premises. An officer levying upon personal property has the right to the temporary possession of the premises long enough for him, with reasonable diligence, to inventory and remove for storage the property levied upon,[13] and may, without liability to the debtor, have possession a reasonable time for packing and removing the goods.[14]

b. Opening Receptacles

Ordinarily an officer may break into a box or safe to attach the defendant's property, although he has been denied the right to open a safe deposit box rented jointly to the defendant and a third person, or to open packages of goods for inspection and appraisal.

As an incident of the officer's power and duty to take actual possession of tangible property, it has been held that he has the right to open boxes, safes. etc, containing property of defendant for the purpose of attaching such property,[15] or of making an inventory thereof.[16]

But an officer has been held to have no authority to open packages of goods for inspection and appraisal,[17] nor to break into a safe deposit box leased jointly to defendant and a third person.[18]

Safe deposit box

(1) A sheriff may be authorized, in aid of attachment, to open a safe deposit box rented to a debtor, by a safe deposit company, as the debtor cannot be allowed to defeat creditors by merely placing securities in a safe deposit box, the safe deposit box company being protected as against defendant by court order and levy of the sheriff thereon —Carples v Cumberland Coal & Iron Co, 148 N E 185, 240 N Y 187, affirming 207 N Y S. 624, 212 App Div 150

E 185, 240 N Y. 187, affirming 207 N Y S 624, 212 App Div 150, it has been held that a sheriff may not be ordered to break into a safe-deposit box leased jointly to defendant and another, in the absence of a showing that it contains defendant's property, on affirmative oath of colessee that

§ 217. Manner of Levy in General

The manner of levy should be such as to place the property beyond the control of the attachment debtor.

The essential requirement of a levy is that the acts of the attaching officer be such as to put the property out of the control of the attachment debtor.[19]

§ 218. —— Compliance with Statutory Requirements

The levying officer should comply with statutory requirements strictly, according to some authorities, or merely in substance according to others, stricter compliance being required where the rights of third persons are involved.

The proceeding by attachment being in derogation of the common-law, the officer must comply with the statutes in making the levy[20] It has been held that substantial compliance is sufficient,[21] although other authorities are to the effect that special statutory provisions respecting the manner in which attachment shall be levied must be strictly pursued, and that a departure therefrom will render the levy void[22]

Where the levy is asserted not against the rights of defendant in the writ, but against third persons, greater strictness is required than if the rights of defendant were alone concerned,[23] although a levy insufficient against other persons may be sufficient to vest the officer with a special property as against a mere trespasser[24]

In some jurisdictions it has been held that an attachment may be levied on the visible, tangible effects of a defendant in his actual or constructive possession, as an execution is levied,[25] and with like effect.[26]

Certificate of depository as to defendant's interest in attached property. Statutes to the effect that one holding property belonging to a defendant must on his demand furnish to an attaching officer a certificate of defendant's interest therein are for the protection of such officer, who may waive the requirement,[27] and such statutory directions are not mandatory in the sense that compliance therewith is essential to a valid levy.[28] In other words, the levy or attachment is complete when service is effected on the bank or other depository, and the validity of the attachment may not be successfully attacked because the depository did not return a certificate to the officer.[29]

Levy or attachment held valid

A proper entry in the encumbrance book in the office of the clerk of the county, pursuant to Code (1897) § 3899, relating to attachments on realty, construed in connection with § 3923, relating to instructions to the sheriff as to formal requisites of his return, is a good levy, notwithstanding the written return on the writ is not made until a subsequent date —First Nat Bank v. Kindwall, 206 N W. 241, 201 Iowa 82—6 C J. p 220 note 24 [b].

Levies held insufficient

Attachment by actual or constructive possession is essential, followed by serving a copy of the writ with a return of the attachment indorsed as the statute prescribes on the town or city clerk, and an attachment failing to comply with the foregoing statutory requirements is void —Dupont v Moore, 166 A 417, 86 N H 254 —6 C J p 220 note 24 [c]

Loss of writ

Loss of original writ of attachment does not absolve plaintiff from serving, entering, and docketing writ within the time required by statute, but he must proceed by copy under other statutory provisions, by entering and docketing copy, or taking steps towards such end, within the time for entering and docketing the original, failing in which action is not pending in court at the time of motion for filing of and proceedings on certified copy —Cuthbertson v Ritchie, 130 A. 756, 99 Vt 50

Statutory requirements enumerated

Under Gen St (1918) § 5862, the prerequisites of a valid attachment are First, a valid seizure of the property, second, due service on defendant of a copy of the process with a description of the property attached in the officer's certificate, third, a return of the process to the court with a like description of the property attached in the return as certified —Safford v. Under statutory provisions for examination of a depository who fails to furnish the required certificate, or is shown to have furnished a certificate failing to set forth all the property of the attachment defendant in his hands, the examination is restricted to property within the jurisdiction subject to attachment and cannot be extended to property elsewhere [30]

§ 219. —— Necessity of Openness and Notoriety

The levy should be open and notorious in order to affect the rights of third persons.

In order that it may affect third persons the levy should be open and notorious,[31] and to this end it has sometimes been required that the officer should go to the place where defendant's property was to be found, and there, in the presence of one or more credible witnesses, declare that he attached such property at the suit of plaintiff.[32]

§ 220. —— Notice of Levy

a. Necessity
b. Form and sufficiency
c. To whom notice given
d. Time
e. Publication of notice

a. Necessity

The officer should give such notice as may be required by statute, and omission of statutory notice of levy may defeat the jurisdiction of the court.

It is sometimes required by statute that the officer making the levy shall give written notice thereof to defendant, to the person in possession of the property, or some other person or persons designated by the statute, and such provisions, when they exist, must be complied with.[33] A levy made in conformity to law may, however, be effective before service of notice,[34] which in the absence of a provision in the statute to the contrary is requisite to complete the levy rather than to create the attachment lien, which dates from the time of levy and not from that of notice, which can, as will be seen in subdivision d of this section, ordinarily be given within a reasonable period after levy [35]

Where a valid levy is the basis of jurisdiction, the failure to give the statutory notice defeats the jurisdiction of the court [36]

b. Form and Sufficiency

Notice of levy should be made in a form and manner complying with statutory requirements, and must ordinarily be written.

The notice should comply with statutory requirements as respects its form and sufficiency [37]

Written notice is usually required,[38] although it has been held that, where a tenant in possession has actual notice and receipts for the property, a written notice to him is not necessary.[39]

Notices held sufficient

(1) Under a statute providing in respect of levy on machinery, that if it cannot be moved without manifest injury, the levying officer shall not move it, but shall give notice of levy by posting a notice thereof on the outer door of the building in which such property is situated, failure to post notices on the outer door of a shed which was not completely inclosed did not invalidate the levy of an attachment on the machinery in the shed if the notices were conspicuously posted upon the shed —Coast & Lakes Contracting Corp. v. Martin, 101 A 502, 92 Conn 11.

(2) A description in the notice of levy of property as "compressed air machinery" and "three hoisting engines" is sufficient —Coast & Lakes Contracting Corp v. Martin, supra. 6 C J. p 221 note 32 [e].

Notice held insufficient

Under Pub Acts (1911) c 135, providing that if there be no person in charge or possession of the property attached the court before which such action is returnable may order such notice of the action as it may deem reasonable, notice of the action given according to an order of notice not prescribed by the court, but issued by the assistant clerk of the superior court, is insufficient, and renders the attachment judgment void —Fosdick v. Roberson, 100 A 1059, 91 Conn. 571—6 C J. p 221 note 32 [f].

Stating amount of claim

A notice of attachment which did not state the amount of plaintiff's claim, as required by statute, was void —Woodbine Sav Bank v. Yager, 234 N W. 621, 57 S D 645.

Entry as importing lawful notice

An entry of levy, made upon an attachment by a levying officer, reciting attachment had been levied upon described land as defendant's property imports lawful notice to defendant within code requirements —Scott v. Darien Motor Co., 163 S E. 246, 45 Ga App. 102.

must be a legal seizure,[40] and the seizure must be such as to affect the owner with notice of the levy.[41]

c. To Whom Notice Given

Notice should be given to the person or persons designated by statute.

Notice should be given to the person or persons designated by statute, as to the defendant or his agent,[42] or to the person in possession of the attached property,[43] although a notice in fact given to the proper persons will not be invalidated by a trifling error in designating them.[44]

d. Time

Generally notice should be given within a reasonable time after levy and before the return term.

Where the time for giving such notice is not absolutely fixed by the statute, it must be given within a reasonable time after the actual seizure of or levy on the property.[45]

It has been held that a levy on real estate would not be defeated by the fact that the notice was served on the owner the day preceding the levy.[46]

Notice must, when the statute so requires, be completed prior to the return term of the levy.[47]

e. Publication of Notice

Where the statute so provides, notice of levy should be published by posting a copy in a public place or printing it in a newspaper.

In some states the statute requires the officer to post copies of the notice for attachment in public places, and/or to publish the same in newspapers within the county.[48] One purpose of such statutes is to afford notice to other creditors of an attachment defendant, so that if they desire to prorate they may immediately commence and prosecute to final judgment their claims against the debtor.[49]

While the duty of giving notice by publication rests primarily upon the clerk, it is also the duty

Seizure held insufficient

Where, under attachment against nonresident, service was attempted by seizure of thirty-acre tract, and the only seizure relied on was by posting a notice on a building on separate four-acre tract and request by levying officer, that persons at work there notify defendant's absent agent, and there was no actual notice to defendant or agent, judgment for plaintiff on attachment was void, because the seizure designed to replace actual notice was insufficient—United Provisions Corporation v Board of Missions, 124 S.E 820, 33 Ga App. 9

Life tenant not agent

A life tenant in possession is not the agent of the remainderman to receive written notice of levy on the remainderman's interest—Lane v Bradfield, 140 S E. 417, 37 Ga App. 395.

Occupant not tenant in possession

Notice of levy given the occupant of realty is insufficient to justify judgment in attachment suit against the owner, where the owner had rented realty for a year to the occupant, who without the knowledge or consent of the owner, who lived in another state, had continued to occupy the land after refusal of the owner to continue tenancy—Morgan v Rupert, (Ga.) 186 S E 727

Registered letter addressed to defendant but receipted for by another

Where sheriff attempted to attach the interest of remainderman in realty in possession of a life tenant, a letter containing notice sent to remainderman by levy officer by registered mail, receipted for by third person purporting to act for remainderman, but whose authority to do so did not appear, was held insufficient to afford legal notice of attachment to remainderman—Lane v. Two days after delivery of warrant

A statute providing that execution of attachment shall be made by leaving a certified copy of warrant of attachment with certain persons, with a notice showing property levied upon, but not saying that the two must be served together, does not require that "notice" shall be served at instant of delivery of warrant, but service of attachment and notice showing property levied on within two days thereafter was sufficient—Prevost v. Post, 173 S E. 628, 172 S C 228.

(1) Under a code provision requiring that copies of the attachment be affixed to the door of the room where the court in which the suit is pending is held, posting on the front door of the courthouse has been held sufficient—Pertutta Bros v. Shields, 4 La App 24.

(2) Posting writ or mandate of attachment has been held essential under such code provision, so that posting merely of the petition and the order for the attachment was not sufficient—Parry v. Cox, 4 La App 238 of the attachment plaintiff to inform himself as to whether or not the clerk has acted, and if not it is within plaintiff's power to compel the clerk to act,[50] and creditors otherwise commencing their actions in time will not be deprived of the right to prorate because of the clerk's failure to perform his statutory duty of publication, nor may an attachment plaintiff derive any benefit from neglect of his obligation to cause the clerk to do his duty in respect of publication.[51]

The right of another creditor of the attachment defendant to prorate does not depend upon whether such creditor is actually cognizant of the posting and publication of the notice, and if he begins his action after the posting and publication of notice and obtains judgment within the statutory period, he is entitled to prorate whether his bringing of suit was or was not prompted by a knowledge of the giving of notice of attachment.[52]

Time of posting or publication Statutes fixing the time of posting and publication are directory rather than mandatory so far as the rights of other creditors are concerned, and the attachment plaintiff is not entitled to the benefit of limitations on the time of prorating until after the actual giving of the notice by posting or publication.[53] Posting and publication after the time fixed by statute is not a nullity.[54]

§ 221. Levy on Personalty

Broadly speaking, to effect a levy on personalty the attaching officer should assume dominion over the property such as would render him a trespasser if not protected by the writ.

While the cases on the question of what will constitute a valid levy on personalty are not entirely harmonious,[55] it may be stated as a general rule that, in order to make a valid levy upon personalty, the officer executing the attachment must assume dominion over the property; he must not only have the property in view, but he must assert his dominion over it by such acts as would render him liable to an action for trespass but for the protection afforded him by process,[56] or, as stated in some decisions, the officer must assume such control and possession over the property that the real owner may bring replevin.[57]

§ 222. —— Service of Writ or Warrant

a. In general
b Time and place of service

a. In General

Service of the writ must be made as required by the applicable statutes

Where the statute requires a writ or warrant to be served on defendant, service must be made in the mode prescribed by statute.[58]

A substituted service is void if the officer's return does not show that diligent search was made for defendant during the whole time within which personal service might lawfully be made.[59]

A provision that the officer levying upon personal property capable of manual delivery shall deliver without delay to the person from whose possession the property is taken, if any, a copy of the warrant and of the affidavits upon which it was granted has been held to be merely directory.[60]

A defendant who absconds from the county and state thereby waives service of a copy of the writ.[61]

b. Time and Place of Service

Service should be made at the place and within the time prescribed by statute.

Where the law requires service a specified time before the return day, service made on the return day is insufficient.[62]

Necessity of service

(1) In South Carolina it has been held that under Code Civ Proc (1912) § 234, in proceedings to secure jurisdiction of a defendant by attachment, followed by service of the summons, the writ of attachment need not be served except where the attachment is of realty—Stephens v. Ringling, 86 S E 683, 102 S C 333

(2) It has also been held that the warrant of attachment need not be served on the person in whose hands personal property of defendant may be found, but that it is sufficient to give such person notice of the attachment and demand surrender of the property—Sanders v. D. Landreth Seed Co., 74 S E 120, 91 S C 26.

Service on nonresidents

A writ of attachment is not a "judicial writ" within P S 1444, relating to the service of judicial writs on nonresidents—Kittredge v Fairbanks Co, 99 A 1016, 91 Vt. 174—6 C J p 232 note 90 [c]

An attachment against a nonresident may, it has been held, be sued out in any county and served in another county by summons of garnishment issued and returnable in that county [65]

§ 223. —— Taking Possession and Removing Property in General

a. General rules
b Removal
c. Property capable of manual seizure in general
d Property incapable or difficult of manual seizure in general
e. Animals
g Debts and instruments for the payment of money
f. Crops

a. General Rules

The officer should take possession of personalty in order to effect a levy thereon, and his control over the property should be such as to preclude another from lawfully taking it without his knowledge. Possession may be actual or constructive in accordance with the nature of the personalty seized, and actual possession need not be taken immediately on service of the writ.

A levy upon personalty must be made by a seizure and taking of the attached property into custody by the officer,[66] either actually or constructively, according to the nature of the property;[67] and generally speaking the custody and control should be such as to enable the officer to retain and assert his power over the property, so that it cannot properly be withdrawn or taken by another without his knowing it.[68] It is not, how-

Judgment and execution rendered void

Where, after husband had transferred interest in stock of goods and fixtures to wife, the husband's creditor procured a writ of attachment which was not served on the wife until the return day, it was held that judgment and execution issued thereon were void, since the writ must be served at least six days before the return day, the court saying: "Whether the service is personal or substituted, the writ must be served at least six days before the return day."—Kobie v. (2) A sufficient attachment of personal property is made by taking possession of the same, to be forthcoming on execution.—Bass v. Dumas, 95 A 286, 114 Me 50

(3) As respects personalty, the seizure, and not the official entry by sheriff or deputies, constitutes the "levy"—McBrien v. Harris, 145 S E 919, 39 Ga App 41.

(4) Where the city marshal of city of Buffalo delivered a certified copy of warrant of attachment issued in action for money due, to defendant's debtor, and gave notice that a portion of such indebtedness was thereby attached, and demanded certificate of amount due, it was held that, although the marshal did not obtain certificate required by Civ Pract Act § 918, nor make out proper inventory under § 921, the levy itself was complete—Korytkowski v. Grenie-wicki, 221 N.Y S. 119, 220 App Div. 237.

Acts held not to constitute valid levy

Posting notice of attempted levy of attachment on combine and tractor has been held insufficient to constitute a legal levy of attachment where the sheriff did not take physical possession of the property—Osborn v. Paul, (Tex Civ App) 27 S W (2d) 572—6 C J p 223 note 45 [g].

Nature and condition of property as controlling

6 C J. p 225 note 47.

"In making a valid levy of an order of attachment, the weight of authority appears to support the rule that the officer executing the order must take only such possession of the property as he may be able to according to the nature of the property levied upon, but it is essential that the officer assumes control and dominion over it"—Fiegel v. First Nat. Bank of Kingfisher, supra

Independent of statute, to preserve and continue the attachment, the officer must retain possession, by having the actual physical custody, or such control as to have the power of taking immediate possession—Bass v Dumas, 95 A. 286, 114 Me 50.

Statutes obviating necessity of retaining possession

To relieve an attaching officer from the necessity of retaining actual possession of bulky articles, by filing the return specified under statutes regulating such matters, he must follow the statute—Bass v. Dumas, 95 A 286, 114 Me. 50.

ever, essential that the levying officer take actual possession of the property immediately upon service of the writ in order to effect a valid attachment against the defendant owner.[69]

A mere verbal declaration of a seizure or an intent to seize is not sufficient,[70] nor does service of a copy of the warrant on the person in charge of goods and informing him of the character of the papers, without taking any further steps, constitute a valid levy;[71] nor, it has been held, may a valid levy be shown merely by proof of an acceptance of service for garnishees by an insurance commissioner, without compliance with applicable statutes requiring the attaching officer to go to the persons in possession of the property and then and there declare in the presence of witnesses that he attaches such property.[72]

b. Removal

Ordinarily a levying officer should remove attached personalty and place it under his own control. But physical removal is unnecessary where other effective steps are taken to transfer control of the property from the debtor to the officer.

Where personal property has been attached by an officer, the latter may, and as a general rule should, remove the same and hold it in his individual control,[73] and such removal should be without unreasonable delay, or the officer will become a trespasser.[74] Removal, however, is not always indispensable;[75] and where an actual removal would occasion great and unnecessary expense, would be positively injurious to the parties, or, from the nature of the property, would be exceedingly inconvenient,[76] and other acts of notoriety, which may notify creditors that the goods are in the custody of the law, may be equivalent to a removal,[77] the goods may be left where they were before the seizure, provided they are actually put out of the control of the debtor.[78]

Where, for any of the reasons stated, the removal of the property is inadvisable, it is the usual practice for the officer to retain the goods in his custody in the place where levied on, through someone selected to take charge thereof for him,[79] and this will be sufficient, unless it is done colorably to give the appearance of an attachment where in truth none exists.[80] It has even been held that a valid attachment levy may exist although the levying officer fails to leave an agent in charge of unremoved property.[81]

c. Property Capable of Manual Seizure in General

Ordinarily an attaching officer should take actual possession or physical control of tangible personalty; and property must be such as to put it out of control of the debtor by assumption of control by the officer, and keep same in his charge or in charge of some one for him, the officer being authorized to deputize a third person to control and keep it for him as such officer.—Fleming v. Locking up the property

Where a levying officer left attached property in defendant's store, but put it under lock, taking the keys and adding a lock of his own, and where he neglected to post a notice of levy on the door but did file a return affording constructive notice of levy, such officer's levy was effective as against a second attaching officer although the first officer had not actually removed the attached property. Placing the property under lock and filing the attachment return served to give the first officer control of the property and constituted a taking of "physical possession" thereof within applicable requirements of the civil practice act.—Florea v Schultz, 217 N.Y.S. 764, 128 Misc 77.

Notification to owner sufficient

where he seeks to levy on part of a mass should first identify and separate the part to be attached.

In the case of tangible property susceptible of manual seizure and delivery and not in the possession of a third person, such property must be actually seized and taken into possession by the levying officer,[82] who must take and maintain actual custody and control of the property by such means as will exclude others from such custody,[83] but while the possession must be actual in the sense that it takes the property from the immediate control of defendant and gives the officer control over it,[84] so that he is able to touch or remove it,[85] the officer may take and maintain the actual custody and control of the property without actually touching or handling the same, by such means as will exclude all others from the custody, or will give timely and unequivocal notice of the custody of the attaching officer.[86]

It has also been held that seizure of part of a certain thing will bind the whole when it comes to hand;[87] and where a variety of articles are attached and it requires considerable time to complete the process, if the officer, after he has begun it, continues within a day without unnecessary delay until he has secured all the goods, the taking may be treated as one act.[88] It is, however, essential where an attachment is to be levied on part of a whole, that the part attached should be separated so that it may appear which portion was in fact attached.[89]

d. Property Incapable or Difficult of Manual Seizure in General

The levying officer may attach personalty incapable or difficult of manual seizure without taking actual possession, provided he performs a notorious and unequivocal act equivalent to actual seizure.

Where property is incapable or difficult of manual delivery, the officer may not be required to take actual possession thereof,[90] but some notorious

The mere placing of notices on lion's cages did not constitute an attachment, it being necessary to take the property into possession, either actually or constructively by placing a keeper in charge, or by some act which unequivocally placed the property in the officer's possession—Knox v. Inventory

Where a sheriff levied attachment on restaurant fixtures, and put them in charge of the manager of the restaurant to hold for him under the attachment, the lien of attachment was not invalid because of the failure of the sheriff to take and retain possession—American Nat Bank v John Van Range Co, 278 S W 133, 211 Ky 849—6 C.J. p 228 note 70 [c] (2).

Heavy and unmanageable articles

(1) "There is no necessity for an actual handling of heavy and unmanageable articles. . . The mere service of a writ upon the defendant, as in the case of attachment of real estate, is sufficient"—Irilarry v Byers, 257 P 540, 541, 84 Cal App 28.

(2) Where machinery, tools, implements, and paraphernalia of contractor constructing dam were attached, and all of such property was under control of one keeper, it was presumably attached and held together—Irilarry v. Byers, supra.

act as nearly equivalent to actual seizure as practical must be substituted,[91] and such steps taken as will fasten the property in the hands of the person who has possession or control, to await the judgment in the case, or such person must be required to place it in the hands of the court.[92]

Some statutes prescribe that a levy upon such personalty is to be made by delivering a copy of the writ or order, with a notice specifying the property attached, to the person holding the same or to his authorized agent,[93] while others provide that a certified copy of the writ and of the return may, within a certain time, be deposited in a specified office, and that such attachment shall then be as valid as if the articles had been retained by the officer,[94] or provide for both the service and the filing of notice of levy.[95]

e. Animals

The levying officer should take actual possession of animals where feasible, although constructive possession is sufficient to support an attachment of animals on the range or otherwise difficult of physical control.

It has been held that to levy an attachment upon a wild animal in captivity, actual possession or custody must be taken, so that mere notice of attachment is not sufficient to effect a valid levy.[96]

On the other hand, it has also been held that a constructive seizure is sufficient in the case of farm animals.[97]

Property of cumbersome character

Attaching officer need not lay hands on or remove property attached especially where the property is of such cumbersome nature that its manipulation would involve great expense or difficulty—Hart v Oliver Farm Equipment Sales Co, 21 P (2d) 96, 37 N M 267, 87 A L R. 962

Property subject to lien

A shipment of tobacco from a foreign country, refused by the consignee, and upon which an express company, to which bills of lading were sent, had a lien, so that the property was not capable of manual delivery, may be attached by leaving copy of the warrant of attachment with the express company and with the warehouseman in possession of the property itself—Dugundji v. Palco, 180 N Y S 381, 190 App Div 707.

Warehouse has been held "personal property not capable of manual delivery," within attachment statute permitting levy without taking such property into actual custody or possession—Quarles v. Citizens' Nat. Bank of Salmon, Idaho, (C C A Idaho) 31 F (2d) 40.

Chase Nat Bank of City of New York, 2 N E (2d) 664, 271 N Y 294, modifying 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div. 572, and 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div 572—Dugundji v Palco, 180 N.Y S. 381, 190 App Div 707—Elias v Steel Furniture Co, 239 N Y.S 261, 131 Misc 941—Prahl Const Corporation v Jeffs, 215 N Y S 96, 126 Misc 802—6 C J p 229 note 73.

Purpose

In attachment of personal property incapable of manual delivery, the statute requires service on the person holding such property of both warrant and notice, and the holder of the property must look to notice to ascertain what property is attached and base his action thereon—Cotnareanu v. Chase Nat. Bank of City of New York, 2 N E (2d) 664, 271 N Y. 294, modifying 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div. 572, and 283 N Y S. 1018, 246 App Div 573

Notice held sufficient

In an action brought in aid of execution to compel delivery of stock certificates alleged to have been subject to levy of attachment, the defense that individual defendant had obtained a valid lien on the attachment debtor's interest in such stock certificates by attachment with notice of levy specifying in detail and by number the certificates belonging to the attachment debtor is sufficient in law on the face thereof—Cotnareanu v. National City Bank of New York, 3 N E (2d) 451, 271 N Y 619, modifying 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div 572, and 283 N Y S 1019, 246 App Div. 572

Notice held insufficient

(1) An attachment levy is invalid where the notice of levy upon stock certificates served with warrant did not show that such certificates registered in names of nominees of attachment debtor belonged to him and were attached—Cotnareanu v. National City Bank of New York, 3 N E (2d) 451, 271 N Y. 619, modifying 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div 572, and 283 N Y S 1019, 246 App Div 572, and following Cotnareanu v. Chase Nat Bank of City of New York, 2 N E (2d) 664, 271 N Y. 294

(2) Service on bank of certified copy of attachment warrant and notice that the sheriff attached all property debts, credits, and effects and all rights and shares of stock of defendant in attachment in possession of the bank does not effect levy, in the absence of circumstances tending to identify to bank the property in its possession in which the attachment debtor claimed to have an interest—Cotnareanu v. Chase Nat Bank of City of New York, 2 N E (2d) 664, 271 N Y 294, modifying 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div 572, and 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div. 573

(3) Plaintiff in attachment suit acquired no lien against defendant's shares of stock in possession of a bank in the name of a third person by service of warrant and notice that the sheriff attached all the property, debts, credits, and effects and all rights and shares of stock of defendant in possession of the bank where the bank was apprised of asserted interest of attachment defendant in stock certificates after judgment against attachment defendant had been entered—Cotnareanu v. Chase Nat Bank of City of New York, 2 N E (2d) 664, 271 N Y. 294, modifying 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div 572, and 283 N Y S 1018, 246 App Div 573.

Where sheriff did not take physical possession of horses, cattle, and hogs on a farm, nor cause them to Animals on range. Owing to the difficulty in taking possession of range stock, provision is made in some of the states for levy upon such property by filing a copy of the writ with a designated officer, together with a notice thereto appended, containing the number and description of stock, that such property or a portion thereof is attached[98] In others the levy may be made, in the presence of certain credible witnesses, by designating by reasonable estimate the number of the animals, describing them by their marks and brands, or either, and giving notice thereof in writing to the owner, his herder, or agent, if residing within the county and known to the levying officer[99] Where so required there must be filed with the recorder a copy of the notice attached to the copy of the writ.[1]

f. Crops

An attaching officer may levy on growing crops without taking actual possession thereof, although actual possession is prerequisite to a levy on severed crops susceptible of manual custody.

To effect a levy of attachment upon growing crops it is ordinarily unnecessary to take actual possession,[2] although the levying officer should notify the person in possession of the fact of levy and should assume control of such crops[3]

The taking of actual possession or control has been held essential in the case of crops which are grown but unharvested,[4] and crops severed and capable of manual custody must be reduced to actual possession in order to effect a valid levy thereon.[5]

g. Debts and Instruments for the Payment of Money

An instrument for the payment of money is property subject to manual seizure and an attachment levy thereon should be made by taking actual possession of the instrument. On the other hand the debt represented by a contract or unissued instrument is not susceptible of manual seizure and may be levied upon by constructive seizure, as by serving a copy of the attachment writ upon the person charged with payment. Levy on a judgment must of necessity be symbolical.

An instrument for the payment of money is property capable of manual delivery within the meaning of the attachment law, and hence an actual taking into the custody of the attaching officer is necessary to constitute a valid levy upon written evidences of debt,[6] such as bonds,[7] promissory notes,[8] or checks,[9] and actual possession is essential to a valid attachment levy on other instruments which are unilateral contracts for the payment of money only,[10] acknowledge an absolute obligation to pay,[11] and constitute evidences of debt, the title to which may pass by delivery merely.[12]

On the other hand, a debt not represented by a written instrument is incapable of manual delivery, and debts or contracts for the payment of money not in written form may be attached by constructive seizure, as by serving a certified copy of the writ or warrant of attachment on the person charged with payment.[13]

A levy upon a judgment must necessarily be symbolical, and is effective if made in accordance with applicable statutory provisions as to attaching judgments.[14]

§ 224. —— Shares of Corporate Stock

Under some statutes an officer may attach corporate stock by serving process on the corporation, although under others actual seizure of the stock certificate is essential.

Under statutes in some jurisdictions an attachment may be levied on shares of stock in a corporation, or options, rights, or interests therein, by constructive seizure, as by delivering to a designated officer of the corporation a copy of the writ or warrant and a notice specifying the property attached.[15]

A substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient,[16] although it is essential that service should be made upon the corporation in compliance with statutory requirements, which are mandatory in this respect.[17]

Service of the prescribed process upon the corporation completes the levy,[18] even though the stock, options, rights, or interests made subject to attachment do not appear on the corporate books,[19] and compliance by the corporation with statutory requirements that it deliver to the officer a certificate showing the property attached and identifying the shares or interests levied upon is not essential to the validity of the attachment.[20]

Seizure of the certificates has been held not essential to an effective attachment of shares of stock under statutes permitting levy by service of process on the corporation,[21] although there is authority requiring seizure as respects attachment of stock in a domestic corporation owned by a nonresident defendant who has the stock in his possession outside the state,[22] and under statutory

Unsigned municipal warrant; levy on debt

Where a municipal warrant for payment of money had not yet reached the hands of the city treasurer, nor been signed by him, there was no available property capable of manual seizure by the attaching officer, and the latter could properly levy on the debt due from the city by serving the warrant of attachment on such treasurer—Prahl Const. Corporation v. Jeffs, 215 N.Y. S. 96, 126 Misc. 802.

Bank deposit of proceeds of sale

Where goods belonging to a nonresident debtor had been sold, and the proceeds deposited with a bank, such proceeds are not attachable by a creditor as property capable of manual delivery, but only as a demand owing by the bank to the debtor.—Riggi Bros. Nonresident's stock; certificate within state

Under Code Civ Proc. § 647, providing for attachment of "the rights or shares which the defendant has in the stock of an association or corporation . . together with the interest and profits thereon," and in view of § 619 subd 3, specifying the manner in which intangible property must be attached, the corporate stock of nonresident defendant in a foreign corporation was properly attached by leaving a certified copy of the warrant and notice showing the property attached on the person within the state in possession of the certificates of the stock, although defendant had not given such person irrevocable powers of attorney enabling him to retransfer the stock, since it was the interest of defendant in the securities which the sheriff attached, and it was immaterial whether the securities were negotiable—General Motors Corporation v Ver Linden, 192 N.Y.S 28, 199 App Div. 375.

provisions, such as the Uniform Stock Transfer Act, which expressly make an actual seizure essential to the validity of an attachment of shares of stock, or contain general provisions making certificates of stock negotiable and investing the certificates with many of the incidents of tangible personal property, seizure has been held a condition precedent to attachment of corporate stock.[23]

Statutes relating to bulky tangibles and the like. Statutes providing that where an officer levies an attachment constructively upon any live stock or articles which by reason of their size, situation, or inflammable qualities are incapable of being conveniently taken into actual possession, the attachment shall not be defeated by his failure to take actual possession of the property, do not apply to stock certificates.[24]

§ 225. —— Having Property in View

An officer may attach personalty within his view and control without touching it. Ordinarily he should actually see the property attached, although this is not essential if circumstances show that he took actual control of unseen personalty.

Although an officer may make a valid levy on property within his view and power to control without actually touching it,[25] it is usually held necessary that he should have it in his view at the time of making the levy.[26] It has also been held, however, that a view of the property is not absolutely necessary where the officer assumes dominion over the property, having it, at the time, within his power and subject to immediate seizure.[27]

§ 226. —— Mortgaged or Pledged Property

a. Seizure upon payment or tender of amount due

b Levy subject to mortgage or pledge

a. Seizure upon Payment or Tender of Amount Due

Levy upon tangible personalty subject to mortgage or pledge may and should be made upon payment, tender, or deposit of the amount due in accordance with statutes governing such procedure Statutes requiring payment, tender, or deposit have, however, been construed as for the benefit of the mortgagee only and as inapplicable to property not subject to the mortgage or subject only to a foreign mortgage.

Under the law of some jurisdictions an attachment levy may be made upon mortgaged or pledged personalty on payment or tender of the amount due on the mortgage or pledge, or deposit of such amount with a specified public officer, such as the clerk of the court of the county from which the attachment issued, and the prescribed payment, tender, or deposit is essential to the validity of the attachment on the mortgaged or pledged property.[28]

If the officer levies an attachment upon the property by seizing the same and appoints a keeper without complying with the foregoing requirements, the attachment is unlawful as against the mortgagee,[29] and it has been held that he will be liable to the mortgagee as for a conversion, although he does not move or otherwise disturb the property.[30]

Such statutes, however, have been construed as strictly for the benefit of the mortgagee and not that of the mortgagor,[31] and they do not apply to any part of the attached property which is not subject to the mortgage,[32] nor, it has been held, to personalty within the state and subject to a foreign mortgage[33]

b. Levy Subject to Mortgage or Pledge

Levy of an attachment upon the mortgagor's or pledgor's equity of redemption should be made as on intangible property.

Mortgaged chattels may be also attached by levying on the right or equity of redemption, subject to the rights of the holder of the mortgage or pledge,[34] and such a levy may properly be made as on intangible property.[35]

It has been held that where the officer levies an attachment upon certain goods subject to a mortgage and takes possession of the same as against all persons except the mortgagee, and defendant in the attachment is wholly divested of his possession of the goods, such levy is sufficient as to defendant, whether or not it be sufficient as to some third person claiming some interest in the goods, and he may not be wholly and entirely divested of the possession.[36]

A levy on a pledged note has been held sufficient where notice was served on the pledgee and the note was permitted to remain in his hands[37]

§ 227. Levy on Realty

Realty may be attached by constructive seizure effected through overt act, notice, and recording of the attachment lien.

Broadly speaking, a levy of attachment upon realty, unlike personalty, is perfected by notice and recording without actual seizure and possession[38] To constitute a valid levy upon land, the officer must do some act which shows that he has seized the property and exercised dominion over it, and which is sufficient to put the owner or his tenant upon notice,[39] but owing to the difficulty of making a seizure of lands the law has invented the fiction of constructive seizure, which may be accomplished in various ways under the statutes of the different states.[40] The tenant is not thereby dispossessed,[41] and, in the absence of statute requiring it, it is not necessary that the officer in levying upon land should take possession of the same,[42] enter upon it,[43] or even, it has been held, have the same in his view.[44]

An attachment of all the right, title, and interest which the debtor has in lands is a good attachment of the land itself[45]

§ 228. —— Service of Writ and Description

a In general
b Service of writ on defendant
c. Service of writ and description on occupant

a. In General

Service of the writ in compliance with statutory requirements is sufficient.

It is sufficient if a writ of attachment on realty is served in compliance with regulatory statutory provisions[46]

Statutory notice of levy of attachment on land need only describe property levied on.—Finch, Van

b. Service of Writ on Defendant

The writ must be served on defendant if statute so requires.

In some jurisdictions the statutes provide for service of a copy of the writ upon defendant in the action if he can be found in the county, and under such a statute it has been held that the attachment lien does not become valid until the writ is properly served by delivering a copy to defendant or the equivalent of such service [47]

c. Service of Writ and Description on Occupant

Compliance with statutory requirements, if existent, that a copy of the writ, usually accompanied by a description of the property and notice, be left with the occupant is essential to the validity of an attachment on realty.

Under some statutes a copy of the writ, usually accompanied by a description of the property attached and a notice that it is attached, should be left with the occupant of the property in making a levy upon real estate, and a failure to comply with such a requirement is fatal to the validity of the levy.[48]

The levy of an order of attachment on a tract of land owned by one party defendant by giving the occupant a copy and posting another does not create a lien upon a different tract of land a considerable distance away and owned by another defendant.[49]

§ 229. —— Declaration on Premises in Presence of Witnesses

Under some practice the officer may levy on realty by declaration of attachment made on the premises in the presence of witnesses.

In some states the levy may be made by the officer going to the house and lands of defendant, or to the person or house of the person in whose custody and possession defendant's property or estate may be, and then and there declaring in the presence of credible witnesses that he attaches the lands and tenements of such defendant at the suit of plaintiff [50]

Under some statutes an officer may levy an attachment on realty by an indorsement of the levy on the writ or return.

In some jurisdictions a levy on real property may, by statute, be made by an indorsement of such levy on the writ, or, as it is worded in some reported cases, by an indorsement on the officer's return upon the process [51]

§ 231. —— Posting Copy of Writ or Order upon Property

A levy on realty may be invalidated by noncompliance with statutory regulations as to posting notice of attachment and the like. Distinct tracts should be separately posted, although in the case of adjoining lots it is unnecessary to post each separately.

It is a common provision in a number of the states that where there is no occupant of the property a copy of the writ, and description, and notice that the property is attached shall be posted in a conspicuous place on such property, and a failure to comply with such a requirement is fatal to the validity of the levy [52]

A levy upon a large number of adjoining town lots is not invalidated by a failure to place a copy of the writ on each separate lot,[53] but posting a copy on one tract will not be sufficient as a levy on another separate and distinct tract.[54]

§ 232. —— Filing and Recording

The authorities disagree as to the mandatory character of statutes calling for the filing and recording of the writ, certificate of attachment, and other papers.

In some jurisdictions in addition to some one of the foregoing steps, and in others in lieu thereof, it is provided that the levying officer shall file with some designated officer a copy of the writ, certificate of attachment, or the like, together with a description of the property attached and a notice that it is attached.[55] As a general rule compliance with these requirements is held to be necessary in order to constitute a valid levy on real property,[56] but there is also authority for the view that such provisions are intended only to provide a method of giving notice of the attachment and a compliance therewith is no part of the levy,[57] and that noncompliance does not invalidate the attachment as against one having actual notice of the levy.[58]

§ 233. Levy on Interest in Land

Broadly speaking an interest in land may be attached by levy in the manner provided for attachment of land, although it is held that an equitable interest may be attached only by bill in equity. Seizure of realty in possession of a life tenant does not levy an attachment on the interest of the remainderman

Where an interest in land is subject to attachment, as explained in §§ 75–78, it has been held that such interest may and should be attached by a levy in the manner provided for the levy of the writ upon real property,[59] although there is also authority to the effect that an equitable interest in realty can be attached only by bill in equity.[60]

Interest of remainderman Seizure of realty in the possession of a life tenant is not a valid levy of attachment as against the interest of the remainderman.[61]

§ 234. Levy on Property Held Jointly

a. In general
b. Property of tenants in common

a. In General

Ordinarily the officer should levy an attachment on a defendant's interest in jointly owned property by constructive seizure, without taking actual possession of the physical property.

In the absence of a statute specially authorizing it, an officer levying under a writ of attachment against the property of a debtor owning property in common or jointly with another, incapable of being separately attached, may not lawfully seize the entire property,[62] and a levy on the undivided interest of an attachment debtor not entitled to possession may and should be made by constructive seizure without taking possession of the physical property.[63] It has been held that a statute providing that executions on judgments may be levied on joint property without taking the property into actual possession does not apply to attachments, although it was further held that such statute would not, if applicable, authorize a levy

There must be at least substantial compliance with statute requiring that, when realty standing in name of third person is attached, notice must be filed that defendant's interest is attached—Welch v Morris, 291 P. 1018, 49 Idaho 781.

Realty transferred from defendant at time of levy

Interest of transferor of cotton tickets

Where by transfer of tickets or certificates by the debtor, before levy of attachment, to the owner of half interest in cotton, the transferee was entitled to possession, only constructive levy could be made on the debtor's half interest, since Rev St art 3740, provides that, where the debtor has an interest but is not entitled to possession, levy cannot be made by taking possession—Taylor v. Benningfield, (Tex.Civ App) 257 S W. 938.

by the sheriff simply indorsing "Levied" on the writ without going to see the property.[64]

b. Property of Tenants in Common

(1) Personalty
(2) Realty

(1) Personalty

In levying an attachment on the interest of a tenant in common in personalty the officer may be justified in taking possession of the property, but should not divide it to attach a specific part as property of the defendant.

An officer in levying upon an interest of a tenant in common in personal property may have the right to take possession of the property,[65] but he has no power to make a division, either with or without the consent of the cotenant, or to attach a specific parcel as the property of the debtor.[66]

(2) Realty

The officer should levy his attachment upon the debtor's undivided interest as tenant in common of realty.

An attachment upon real property of tenants in common should be levied upon the debtor's undivided share in whole or in part.[67]

§ 235. Amount of Property to be Attached and Excessive Levy

a. Amount of property to be attached
b. Excessive levy

a. Amount of Property to Be Attached

The levying officer should attach as much property as may be required to pay the total amount due.

In levying a writ of attachment the officer should take as much of defendant's property subject to attachment as will be sufficient to pay the debt demanded[68] with costs,[69] interest, and incidental expenses,[70] and it has been held that there should also be a proper allowance for the depreciation in value incident to the property seized and to the forced sale.[71] The officer must, however, decide for himself as to the extent and sufficiency of the seizure,[72] exercising a cautious and reasonable discretion such as should influence the conduct of prudent and discreet men in the management of their own affairs.[73]

The right of the attachment creditor, or debtor, to designate the property to be attached has been heretofore considered in § 214.

b. Excessive Levy

(1) In general
(2) Mode of obtaining relief

(1) In General

Excessiveness of levy may not invalidate the attachment, but is ground for discharge of a separable balance not required to pay the claim. Whether the levy is excessive is a question of fact.

Although a levying officer who makes an excessive levy may be liable to an action by the party injured, an attachment is not necessarily rendered void by the mere fact of being excessive,[74] and, where the officer levies upon a larger amount of property than is necessary, this will not authorize a release of the property on the ground of excessive levy, but in such case it is the officer's duty to retain sufficient to satisfy the claim and to discharge the balance.[75]

In the case of an indivisible article of personal property, the attaching officer may seize the same although greatly in excess of the attachment debt, where there is no other or sufficient property available.[76]

The question as to what constitutes an excessive levy is a question of fact and is properly left for the jury.[77]

(2) Mode of Obtaining Relief

The parties may raise the question of excessive levy by application for relief in the court wherein the action is pending. A court has power to protect both the attachment debtor and his other creditors by preventing or discharging an excessive attachment.

The question whether a levy is excessive is one to be presented to the court issuing the writ and in which the action is pending[78] by an application for relief by the debtor, or his successor in interest,[79] and can be raised, it has been held, only by the parties to the action.[80] But it has been said that a court has authority to protect a defendant, as well as other creditors, by preventing an excessive levy of attachment or the holding of more property than is sufficient to meet the debt with the necessary costs and expenses,[81] and the court may, after investigation as to the value of the property, discharge the attachment as to so much thereof as is in excess in value of the amount for which the levy should properly have been made.[82]

§ 236. Inventory and Appraisal

a. Necessity
b. Who may make
c. Time of making
d. Form and requisites
e. Service of inventory
f. Effect and conclusiveness of inventory and appraisal

a. Necessity

It is ordinarily proper, but as dependent upon the statutes may or may not be essential, for the levying officer to make and return an inventory and appraisal of the property attached.

As a general rule the levying officer should make and return an inventory and appraisal of the property attached.[83] But it has been held that an inventory, while proper, is not essential,[84] and that failure to make and file an inventory will not invalidate the levy,[85] although there is also authority to the effect that failure to file an inventory and return in compliance with statutory requirements renders the entire proceeding void.[86]

Where the scheduling and appraising of property taken on attachment are for the protection and benefit of defendant,[87] if such schedule and appraisal are omitted by order or consent of defendant, no rights of other creditors being involved, he will not be heard to object to such omission,[88] and where the provision requiring the inventory is considered as being for the benefit of a creditor it can be enforced only by him.[89] So also where a bond to dissolve an attachment provides for the payment of the amount recovered in the final judgment, and is executed without an appraisal of the attached land, as required by statute, the obligors waive the requirements for an ascertainment of the value of the land and substitute the amount of the final judgment for the appraised value.[90]

It has been held that where the officer in his return to a writ of attachment gives a specific description of the property attached a schedule reiterating the same facts is unnecessary.[91]

The omission of the officer to attach an inventory to his return, as required by statute, may be cured by amendment.[92]

Second appraisal On attachment against an absconding debtor, where there was an appraisal at the time the property was attached, a second appraisal after judgment and before sale is unnecessary.[93]

b. Who May Make

In accordance with the controlling statutes, the inventory and appraisal may be made by the levying officer with the assistance or in the presence of others, by the county clerk, or by disinterested freeholders.

The manner of making an inventory and appraisal is dependent upon statutes. In some jurisdictions the officer is required to make the inventory and appraisal with the assistance of a specified number of credible and disinterested householders[94] who must be first sworn by the officer.[95] In others the officer is required to make an inventory in the presence of a designated number of witnesses,[96] or the inventory and appraisal are required to be made by two disinterested freeholders.[97] The county clerk issuing a writ of attachment is not disqualified from acting as an appraiser.[98]

c. Time of Making

An inventory and appraisal should be made at the time, if any, limited by statute, or within a reasonable time.

As a rule it is not essential to the validity of a levy that the inventory and appraisal should be made forthwith,[99] but it will be sufficient if the same be made within a reasonable time.[1]

Statutes prescribing a period within which an inventory and return should be filed have been construed as mandatory.[2]

d. Form and Requisites

(1) In general
(2) Signature

(1) In General

Broadly speaking an inventory should be true and detailed as to the property seized, and the estimated value thereof should be set forth.

The inventory must be just, true, and minute as to all the property seized, and the estimated value of the several articles of personal property should be stated,[3] but a description of the property so full and true as to preclude any mistake as to what property was attached is sufficient,[4] and it has been held that inability or inadvertence to mention a debt due to attachment defendant as residuary legatee in the inventory filed by the sheriff will not defeat the lien of the attachment, where the attachment itself and the notice were broad enough to cover such indebtedness, since the court may authorize an amendment of the inventory.[5]

It has been held that if several parcels of land are levied on it is not necessary to make a separate appraisement of each lot, but the whole may be appraised by one estimate without specifying the separate value of each parcel.[6]

Such articles as are perishable must, it has been held, be enumerated.[7]

Where the appraisals of property seized under a writ of attachment are referred to in, and attached to, the sheriff's return, the latter must be considered in connection with them in determining whether the appraisal was properly made.[8]

(2) Signature

The inventory and appraisal should be signed by the makers.

Where so required by statute the inventory or appraisal should be signed by the officer before returning the same,[9] and the appraisement should be signed by the appraisers.[10]

e. Service of Inventory

Where the statute so requires, a copy of the inventory should be served on the defendant, but this requirement may be waived, and noncompliance therewith is unavailable to a third person.

10. Hopkins v Langton, 30 Wis. 379—6 C.J. p 240 note 70.

In some states the officer is required to serve on defendant a copy of the inventory at the same time he serves the latter with a copy of the writ.[11] It has been held, however, that the failure of the officer to serve a copy of the inventory on defendant can be taken advantage of by the latter only and is not available for a subsequent attaching creditor,[12] and that a defendant in attachment waived service of a copy of the writ and inventory by absconding from the county and state.[13]

f. Effect and Conclusiveness of Inventory and Appraisal

The inventory is conclusive as to whether specific property was attached, and the appraisal constitutes prima facie evidence of value.

Upon the question of whether any specific property, real or personal, has been attached, the inventory returned by the officer is conclusive,[14] and the appraised value of such property is prima facie evidence of its real value as against the officer.[15] Where, however, personal property seized by the officer is afterward sold by him at official sale, the value of the goods is not determined solely by the appraisal, but the amount received by the officer at such sale is competent evidence of value as is also the opinion of persons familiar with the goods and acquainted generally with the value of such goods.[16]

§ 237. Property Levied on under Other Process

a. Personalty
b. Realty

a. Personalty

(1) Who may levy
(2) Manner of levy

(1) Who May Levy

(a) In general
(b) Deputies

(a) In General

An officer holding personalty under a prior process may levy on the same personalty under a writ of attachment. Where property is held by one officer under process, some authorities deny the right of a different officer to levy an attachment thereon, although other authorities permit it to be subjected to further levies by either the same or a different officer.

An officer who has levied on personalty may subsequently make a levy on the same property under a writ of attachment;[17] but as a seizure and taking possession by the officer is essential in case of a levy upon personalty, as has been explained in § 223, it has been held in some jurisdictions that, where goods are held by an officer under other process, an attachment can be levied thereupon only by such officer, and another officer cannot make a levy thereon even though the officer holding the property assents to the subsequent so-called levy,[18] or although such officer or his keeper agrees to act also as the keeper of the second officer.[19] According to the decisions in other states, however, if personal property is levied upon under a writ, it may still be subjected to further levies either by the same or another officer, such levy being made subject to the prior levy or levies.[20]

(b) Deputies

Some authorities permit a deputy to attach property held under process by his principal, on the theory that the deputy and the principal are one officer, while others forbid such levy on the ground that they are different officers.

In some jurisdictions it is held that a deputy is so far a different officer from his principal as to come within the meaning of the rule forbidding levies on the same property by different officers, and that he is therefore unable to levy upon goods already attached by such principal.[21] In other jurisdictions, however, the acts of the deputy are regarded as the acts of the principal, and a deputy may levy an attachment upon property already attached by his principal through another deputy.[22]

(2) Manner of Levy

(a) By officer who made previous levy
(b) By officer other than one who made previous levy

(a) By Officer Who Made Previous Levy

An officer in possession of property under prior process may levy thereon without overt act and merely by noting the attachment on his return, although this rule is inapplicable where the officer lacks possession.

Where an officer holds actual or constructive possession of property under a prior levy, but not otherwise,[23] no affirmative or overt act on his part is necessary in making a levy under a subsequent writ;[24] but he may simply treat the property as seized under the subsequent writ also and make his return accordingly.[25]

(b) By Officer Other than One Who Made Previous Levy

Levy of an attachment on property held under prior process by a different officer is effected by notifying the officer in possession. The return may describe the property as all that is in custody of such prior officer.

Where a subsequent levy is made by an officer other than the one who made the first levy, the possession of the first officer is not to be disturbed, but the levy is made by notifying the officer in possession of the making of it.[26] In such case the return need not specify the property, but it is sufficient to refer to the property as all which is in the custody of the officer in possession.[27]

b. Realty

Levy on land held under process by a different officer confers a valid, although subsequent, attachment lien.

Since in the case of levy upon realty, the officer levying acquires neither title, possession, nor special property, as shown in §§ 227, 240, there is no reason why an attachment creditor may not acquire a valid lien by the levy of a writ of attachment on land on which another officer has already levied an attachment or execution,[28] subject, of course, to the lien of the prior attachment or execution creditor.[29]

§ 238. Successive Levies under Same Writ

Successive levies under the writ are permissible in the absence of fraud. Further, an unofficial sale of attached property under agreement and delivery of the money proceeds to the attaching officer is in effect a release of the attachment on the property and a transfer thereof to the money.

A writ of attachment is not rendered functus officio by the first levy thereunder,[30] and in the absence of fraud there is no reason which will prevent a second levy upon personal property, under the outstanding writ, where such property has once been taken but afterward surrendered by mistake or otherwise, no other rights intervene, and the legal owner interposes no protest against such second levy.[31] Where an officer attaches property at different times on the same writ copies need not be left in each instance, the leaving of a single copy including a list of all the property attached before the time of service elapses being held, on a plea in abatement, to constitute good service.[32]

The practical effect of an executed agreement by plaintiff and defendant for sale of attached property under direction of the sheriff and the turning over of the proceeds to him, is to effect a release of the attachment on the tangible property and a levy of the attachment on the money proceeds.[33]

a. In General

Levy of an attachment transfers the property from the debtor's custody to that of the law. In the absence of contrary statute, or special circumstances such as fraud, the attaching creditor secures only such rights in the property as his debtor had at the time of attachment

The effect of an attachment is to put the property into the custody of the law,[34] to secure it against alienation of the debtor and the judgments of other creditors and to hold it to be levied upon by execution when judgment shall have been obtained, a specific lien being created.[35] The rights of the attaching creditor are fixed at the time of levy,[36] the attachment is an encumbrance from that time and a subsequent judgment relates back to it.[37]

The attaching creditor "steps into the shoes" of his debtor and acquires whatever rights the latter may have in the property attached,[38] and the attachment operates only on such rights.[39] While an attaching creditor may in some circumstances occupy the position of an innocent purchaser for value,[40] it is ordinarily held that neither the attaching creditor[41] nor the levying officer,[42] is to be so regarded, and that the levy cannot give to the attachment creditor any other or higher rights than the debtor then has,[43] in the absence of fraud

Statutes making attachment creditor bona fide purchaser

(1) Under statutes providing that from the date of an attachment the plaintiff shall be deemed a bona fide purchaser of the attached property as against third persons, subject to conditions as to recording in the case of real estate, an attachment creditor cannot claim to be a good-faith purchaser, where the premises were in possession of the debtor claiming a homestead exemption—Marvin & Co v. Piazza, 276 P 680, 129 Or. 128.

(1) The provisions of the act governing the sale or pledge of goods by a person who, having sold goods, continues in possession, are inapplicable to the claim of attaching creditor of seller who retained possession of lumber after sale thereof, where there was no showing that sheriff or attaching creditor paid value for lumber or that attachment was based on valid debt—Wheeler Lumber, Bridge & Supply Co v. Shelton, (Or) 29 P (2d) 1013, rehearing denied 31 P (2d) 163.

(2) Where a sheriff, in possession of lumber under attachment, did not allege or prove that defendant in attachment was indebted to plaintiff in writ, nor that the sheriff or plaintiff in attachment was in the position of a purchaser in good faith for valuable consideration, the buyer of the lumber, in view of a completed sale thereof before levy of attachment, was entitled to possession as against the sheriff claiming under attachment—Wheeler Lumber, Bridge & Supply Co v Shelton, supra.

or collusion by which the attaching creditor's rights are impaired,[44] or unless he has been misled by the debtor's apparent ownership of the property attached and has given credit on the faith of such ownership,[45] or the rule is abrogated by statutes as to the effect of unrecorded conveyances or incumbrances as to creditors without notice.[46]

Estoppel of creditor to claim title. The levy of an attachment upon property may estop the attaching creditor to claim title thereto,[47] unless he was unaware that the levy was made upon property in which he had an interest.[48]

A levy upon property not subject to attachment, although it is properly quashed, does not affect the writ itself so as to warrant setting that aside also.[49]

Where a levy is not made in good faith nor for the purpose of its enforcement, but with the object merely to obtain some security or to prevent some other levy being previously made, or to hinder or delay other creditors of the debtor it must be adjudged fraudulent and void.[50]

b. As to Check Holder

A check presented after attachment of a bank deposit should not be paid.

Since, as has been seen in the title Assignments § 60, a check does not, either under the Negotiable Instruments Law or in accordance with many prior authorities, operate as an assignment pro tanto of the deposit against which it is drawn, the bank should not pay any check given previously to the attachment but presented subsequently,[51] although under the view that the giving of a check works an assignment of the deposit pro tanto, the amount thus transferred could not be attached by a creditor of the maker;[52] and consequently a check given before the attachment of such deposit, although not presented until afterward, should be paid to the holder.[53]

The levy of an attachment merely impresses a lien on the property and does not change the title thereto.

The only purpose of levying an attachment is to impress a lien on the property,[54] and the levy does not change the title thereto,[55] even though, as in the case of personalty, it may be taken from the possession and control of defendant,[56] but only enables plaintiff to obtain security for an anticipated judgment.[57] The general property remains in defendant who may alienate such property subject to the lien of the attachment.[58]

The attaching creditor acquires no title to the property attached by means of his attachment,[59] and even, it has been held, no right of action against a third person who may take the property from the officer or destroy it.[60]

The attaching officer acquires at most only a special property in the articles attached,[61] and not an absolute interest.[62]

A levy on realty does not give to plaintiff a right to the possession of the estate nor to the rents, issues, and profits thereof,[63] nor does it confer upon the attaching officer the right to possession nor any special property therein,[64] nor is the interest or possession of the debtor divested by such levy.[65]

§ 241. —— As Satisfaction of Debt or Judgment

The authorities conflict as to whether levy of an attachment operates as a satisfaction of the debt or judgment.

A levy of attachment has been held to be a satisfaction of a debt, if the property is of a sufficient amount,[66] even though the property is wasted by the negligence of the officer, although if the loss occurs without fault on the officer's part the claim will not be extinguished.[67] But the better view is that the levy of an attachment is not a satisfaction of plaintiff's demand as the levy of an execution would be,[68] and it has been held that the seizure of property, even to the full value of the sum claimed under an order of attachment issued during the pendency of an action, is not necessarily a satisfaction of the judgment afterward obtained, and that it must be affirmatively shown that the property was applied to and satisfied the judgment.[69]

A levy effected by improper means is invalid.

It may be stated as a general rule that where a levy is effected by any improper means, as for instance by the use of any fraudulent devices to obtain possession of the property, it will be invalid.[70]

Subsequent proceedings as not precluded

Levy under attachment statutes does not vest in the sheriff such absolute interest in the debt or chose in action as to preclude a subsequent proceeding thereon.—Baugh & Sons Co. v. Crowell Corporation, 151 A. 718, 4 W.W.Harr.(Del.) 231.

70. Pomroy v. Parmlee, 9 Iowa 140, 74 Am.D. 328—6 C.J. p. 245 note 17.

(1) In General

A return good on its face entitles the levy to every reasonable presumption in its favor, and it is not open to collateral attack unless void. But a levy clearly bad may be vacated.

As a general rule where a return has been made which is sufficient on its face every reasonable presumption will be made in favor of the validity of the levy,[71] but where a levy is clearly bad and cannot be cured it will be vacated on motion.[72] Where the return is good on its face the levy cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding unless it is void.[73]

(2) Who May Object

Defects and objections may be urged by those, and only by those, whose rights have been injuriously affected.

Where the levying officer fails to take into his possession such property as is capable of manual seizure, plaintiff may have reason to complain, but defendant is not injured thereby, and such levy will not be set aside on his motion.[74] Although it is indisputable that, where possession of property has been unlawfully obtained for the purpose of levying thereupon, such levy is wrongful and cannot be upheld as against anyone who is so situated that he can urge its invalidity, as has been shown in § 242, yet such objection is not available to a party whose right also springs solely from a seizure effected through the unlawful detention.[75]

Where, in order to render an attachment of realty valid against a subsequent purchaser or attaching creditor, the writ and officer's return, or a copy thereof, must be deposited in the clerk's office, omission to comply with this requirement can be taken advantage of only by parties subsequently purchasing or attaching such real estate.[76]

In an action in aid of an execution issued in an attachment suit, the fact that neither the attachment debtor in his lifetime nor his legal representative since his death questioned plaintiff's attachment does not affect the right of defendant to attack the sufficiency of the attachment, where such attack does not depend on any personal privilege and, more particularly, where it tenders an issue of due process.[77]

Where, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, the mortgagee levies attachment, and the mortgagor interposes a counterclaim a subsequent owner of the mortgaged property, deriving title from the mortgagor, cannot set up, as against the mortgagee, the invalidity of the attachment levy.[78]

(3) Time to Object

Objections to the validity of the levy should be raised in apt time, and may be determined upon proceedings to enforce the levy.

Objection to the sufficiency of the levy of an attachment should be seasonably made,[79] and an objection to the manner of levying an attachment, which is not suggested by answer or upon the hearing below, cannot be taken for the first time on appeal.[80] But where a levy created no lien on account of an irregular return, it was held immaterial that there was no objection to its validity until after the submission of the case, since the court may disregard such levy at any stage of the proceedings.[81]

The question of whether a certain levy made by serving notice on the party claimed to be in possession is valid is properly determinable upon proceedings to enforce the same, and not upon a motion to set it aside and vacate it, since if as made it is invalid there was no valid levy to set aside or vacate.[82]

b. Waiver

(2) Waiver of notice

(1) In General

A levy otherwise insufficient may be made good by waiver or estoppel.

Where the interested parties have acknowledged the legality of a levy of attachment, such legality may not subsequently be questioned.[83] Thus the

In action for conversion

The legality of the levy of an attachment cannot be questioned in an action for conversion where all the conduct of defendant may make an otherwise invalid levy good by way of waiver,[84] estoppel, or agreement.[85]

It has been held that where defendant recognizes the validity of the attachment by giving an undertaking to have it discharged he cannot thereafter question its validity.[86] But in Alabama the execution of a forthcoming bond by a defendant in attachment to gain possession of his property taken under a void levy has been held to be ineffective to validate the levy, and not to deprive defendant of his right to a vacation of the levy on motion.[87]

(2) Waiver of Notice

Statutory notice of levy is subject to waiver.

An attachment defendant may so acquiesce in the levy as to waive a statutory requirement of written notice,[88] and a person in possession of attached property may waive notice so as not to be in a position to dispute the validity of the levy.[89]

c. Effect of Entry of Judgment

Entry of judgment will not cure defects in the levy so as to make what was no lien a valid attachment.

While the entry of judgment may cure some defects in the issue of a writ of attachment[90] such entry will not cure defects in the levy of the writ and make what was no lien a valid one.[91]

VII. RETURN

The return is ordinarily a necessary part of the proceedings, and its omission may constitute a jurisdictional defect.

The return is a necessary part of the proceeding, for by it alone the court is advised of the levy and its sufficiency, by which, as explained in § 202, in case there is no personal service of defendant, jurisdiction is acquired, and without which the court cannot proceed to the final adjudication of the cause.[92]

Due return and proper entry of the levy has been held essential to the jurisdiction of the court,[93] although under other statutes a contrary decision has been reached.[94]

There is also authority to the effect that the court may direct the officer to make the return,[95] or, in its discretionary power to allow amendments, may, when necessary, order it to be made nunc pro tunc.[96]

§ 245. By Whom Made

The return should ordinarily be made by the person authorized to levy and to whom the writ was directed. But as returning an attachment is an official and not a personal duty, the levying officer's deputy or successor may perform the act.

The return must be made by a person authorized by parties acknowledge legality before and at the trial—Southern Arizona Bank & Trust Co. v. Stigers, (Ariz.) 53 P.(2d) 422

Failure to object

Plaintiff, in attachment consenting to the levy as made by the sheriff and reported in his return, and making no objection thereto till after final judgment against the attachment defendant, could not thereafter complain that the sheriff had made an insufficient attachment, as he did by insisting on another levy of the same writ for an additional quantity. —Satterfield v. Under provisions of New York Civ. Pract. Act § 921 not in terms requiring the sheriff to file the attachment or a copy thereof, but merely requiring him to make and file in the county clerk's office an inventory of the property levied upon, it has been held that failure to file the inventory is not jurisdictional, and that the sheriff "is required to file a return to the county clerk's office only in case the attachment is vacated or annulled"—Paragon Coal & Coke Co. v. J. W. Kirby & Sons Coal Co., (D.C.N.Y.) 9 F.(2d) 686, 687.

law, to levy the writ, and to whom it was directed,[97] but the duty of making it is official and not personal,[98] so that the return may be made by a deputy,[99] or by the levying sheriff's successor in office.[1] Where, however, the statute directs a constable, coroner, city marshal, or appointee who has served an attachment, to hand the return over to the sheriff who shall report to the court, a return by the constable directly to the court confers no jurisdiction.[2]

§ 246. To What Court Made

The writ should be returned to the proper court, which is ordinarily that in which it originated.

The court to which the return must be made is fixed either by the express directions of the writ, or, where the direction as to return is general, by statute, and failure to comply with statutory directions relative to the court to which the attachment papers must be returned may invalidate the proceedings.[3] Ordinarily the writ is returnable to the court or office from which it originated.[4]

Return to sheriff. Return of an attachment by the levying constable to the sheriff is not a return thereof to the court.[5]

§ 247. Time for Making

The return should be made in apt time, which is ordinarily the period fixed by statute, or in the absence of statutory specification, a reasonable time.

A return is properly made within the time, if any, fixed by statute.[6] In the absence of any statutory limitation the rule is that an attachment must be returned within a reasonable time;[7] but the mere fact that the return was not made until after the return day of the writ will not defeat the lien.[8] On the other hand, it has been held that if the return shows a substituted service upon defendant it must necessarily not be made before the return day of the writ.[9] The writ is not, in contemplation of law, to be considered as returned until the return day thereof, notwithstanding its actual return before that time,[10] and where the writ was made returnable to the third Tuesday in the month, instead of the first Tuesday when the term began, it was held that it would be presumed that the officer followed the mandate in his return.[11] It is not necessary in order to constitute a valid levy on land that the return should be written out and signed when the levy is made.[12]

The term of court to which an attachment should be returnable is determined by the date of the issuance of the writ, where issuance has been followed by a timely seizure, and in the absence of contrary statute there is no law requiring the execution and return of the writ to be made for any particular time before the return term specified in the writ.[13]

Return held in time

Where an attachment was returnable to October term, 1923, and was returned during that term, although after first day of term it was not subject to dismissal on the ground that it was returned too late—Greene v. Lombard, 126 S.E. 890, 33 Ga.App. 518.

(1) In General

The return should show the fact of levy, although it need not recite that levy was made to satisfy the claim.

The return to a writ of attachment must show that property has been seized thereunder,[14] either actually or constructively;[15] but it is not necessary that any particular words should be employed, and it is sufficient if the fact that the officer has attached property affirmatively appears from a fair construction of the whole return.[16] The return is not rendered insufficient by a failure to state that the levy was made to satisfy "any debt or damages and costs."[17]

(2) As to Manner of Levy

As a rule, the return should recite the acts done by the officer so as to show how the levy was made, although failure to set forth the details of service or levy has been held a mere irregularity and not a jurisdictional defect.

The return should show the manner of service or levy of the writ.[18] It is usually considered necessary that the return should state the facts, that is, set out the acts done by the officer and describe the manner in which the writ was executed, so that the court may judge for itself of the sufficiency of the levy,[19] and that a return which in effect merely states as a conclusion that a proper or sufficient levy was made, is defective.[20] On the other hand, however, the presumption that an officer did his duty, where nothing to the contrary appears, has been considered sufficient to support a levy, although the return did not specify the steps taken by the officer,[21] and it has also been held that the omission to set out the details of the service or levy of the writ is a mere irregularity and not a jurisdictional defect.[22]

Showing compliance with statute. It is usually held sufficient, at least so far as subsequent attaching creditors with notice are concerned,[23] if the return shows that there has been a substantial compliance with the statute,[24] but there is also authority for the view that strict and specific compliance with the statute must be shown by the return itself.[25]

Officer's opinion as to removal of property. Under statutes providing for constructive attachment of machinery, where in the opinion of the levying officer the machines cannot be removed without manifest injury, an attachment will not necessarily fail because the return omits to recite that in the officer's opinion such machines could not be removed without injury.[26]

(3) As to Person Making Levy

The return should show who made the levy.

The return to a writ of attachment should show by whom the levy was made.[27]

(4) As to Time and Place of Levy

The return should show the time of levy, but need not show that it was within the officer's bailiwick

In order to be sufficient, the return should show the date of the levy.[28]

It has been held not essential that the return should show that the levy was made in the county or bailiwick of the levying officer,[29] as it must be presumed, in the absence of anything to show the contrary, that the officer did his duty,[30] and executed the writ legally.[31]

(5) As to Personal Service or Notice

The return should show prescribed personal service of attachment notice, or facts excusing such service and compliance with requirements respecting substituted service; although irregularities in such recitals are not jurisdictional defects.

Under statutes requiring service of personal notice of the attachment on defendant, if he can be found, the return must affirmatively show that such service was properly made,[32] or that it could not have been made with reasonable effort.[33] Where the officer has been unable to find defendant, the return should show that he has complied with the statutory requirements that, in such case, he shall leave a copy of the writ at defendant's usual place of abode,[34] or with the tenant or person in possession of the property attached,[35] or mail a copy of the writ to defendant at his residence,[36] or post a copy of the writ or a notice of the levy in some designated or conspicuous place on such property,[37] although failure of a return to contain due recitals in such respects will not necessarily invalidate the proceedings,[38] and, where the statute does not require the return to recite such facts, omission thereof does not affect the validity of the return.[39]

(6) As to Leaving Copy of Writ for Record

The original return should show prescribed filing of copies of the writ and return.

It has been held that, inasmuch as the original return itself, and not the copy left with the clerk for record, is the evidence of the validity of the levy, it is necessary that the original return itself should state that a copy of the writ and a copy of the descriptive part of the return have been filed with the recording officer as required by statute.[40]

(7) Where Levy Made Subject to Prior Levy

Return of an attachment levied on property held by the officer under a prior process need state only that he has seized defendant's interest in such property; although an officer having two writs at the time of levy should return each as levied on the whole property. Return of an attachment levied on property held by a different officer should recite details of the subsequent levy.

Where an officer levies on property already in his possession by virtue of a former attachment, it is only necessary for him to return that he has attached the interest of defendant in the property at that time in his possession;[41] but it has been held that, where the officer has both writs in his possession when he comes on the property, he should return each writ as levied on the whole property found.[42]

Return of officer making prior levy. Where a levy is made by one officer subject to the levy of another officer who is in possession, the return of the latter must show what was done in respect of the subsequent levy.[43]

b. Description of Property Attached

(1) Necessity
(2) Sufficiency

(1) Necessity

The return must describe the property attached.

The return to a writ of attachment should describe the property on which the levy was made.[44] No lien is acquired as to any property other than that described in the return, and a total failure of the return to designate or describe the attached property will render the attachment inoperative.[45]

(2) Sufficiency

(a) In case of personalty
(b) In case of realty

(a) In Case of Personalty

The return should show the location of personalty, and describe it with certainty sufficient to permit identification.

Failure to designate which of a number were attached

Where defendant had more in number of all the articles of personalty than were attached, and the officer's return did not show which were attached, no lien was created.—Humphrey v. Wheeler, 101 A. 1018, 92 Vt. 47.

It is difficult to lay down a precise or general rule as to what constitutes a sufficient description of personalty levied on under attachment,[46] but it is necessary that the property should be described with such reasonable certainty as to render it distinguishable.[47]

Location of the property should be shown by the return,[48] but a mere statement of the location, standing alone and without any statement of the quality or kind of property seized, is not a sufficient description.[49]

Reference to other papers in some other court or case for a description of the property levied on is not sufficient,[50] but the return may refer to an inventory or appraisement returned with the writ for the description.[51]

Excusable error of misdescription will not avoid the attachment, where from the appearance and use of the articles it is clear that the mistake was natural and in good faith,[52] or where the error was one of judgment as to quantity[53]

Return may be sufficient to confer jurisdiction where it shows that goods of defendant were attached under the writ in the state, although it is not definite as to the quantity or location of the goods.[54]

(b) In Case of Realty

The return should describe realty so that it may be easily identified. A description suitable to a deed is sufficient, but not always essential.

On an attachment of realty the return should describe the land with such precision that it may be readily identified[55] While there is respectable authority to the effect that the description should be as specific as that required in a deed,[56] and while such a description would unquestionably be sufficient in any case,[57] yet, inasmuch as the object of the attachment is merely to secure the jurisdiction of the court over the land until plaintiff establishes his claim, it would seem that the same certainty ought not to be required as when the title is divested.[58]

6 C.J. p. 252 note 92

"To give the officer constructive possession of the property attached, it was necessary that it be described in the return with reasonable certainty. And such certainty requires that the property be sufficiently pointed out to enable the debtor, and those with whom he may deal, to be informed that it is attached."—Humphrey v. Wheeler, supra.

Description held sufficient

A return disclosing that "forty car loads of staves" were attached and taken into possession by the sheriff is sufficient as respects the description of the property.—Daniels v. Taylor, 13 Ohio Cir.Ct.(N.S.) 116, 31 Ohio Cir.Ct. 611—6 C.J. p. 252 note 92 [a].

Description held insufficient

Return setting forth attachment of all shares, stocks, and bonds in a safety deposit box was insufficiently descriptive of property, the inconvenience of taking actual possession not dispensing with reasonable identification.—Dupont v. Moore, 166 A. 417, 86 N.H. 254—6 C.J. p. 252 note 92 [b].

Location as in named town

Descriptions held sufficient

(1) The return on an order of attachment describing land as northeast and northwest quarters of section 22 in township 7, range 38, was not void for indefiniteness or uncertainty.—Hodgen v. Roy, 169 P. 1143, 102 Kan. 197

(2) A return describing property attached as the undivided half interest of a named person in realty duly designated as to location and boundaries was sufficient.—Boone v. Evans, 31 S.W.(2d) 723, 235 Ky. 487

(3) Sheriff's return on an attachment writ, describing property as that of defendant at a specified city and in a designated county "16 acres out of T. & N. O. Ry. Survey 201 Abst. 696, property of defendant," did not insufficiently describe the property.—Lorenz v. Mingus State Bank, (Tex.Civ.App.) 60 S.W.(2d) 462.
6 C.J. p. 253 note 1 [b], [c], [g].

Description by metes and bounds

An attachment of realty by particular, instead of by general, description is not confined to parcels fraudulently conveyed, and the validity of an attachment was not impaired by the circumstance that the officer in his return described the realty by metes and bounds, and called it a "special attachment," although no third persons nor fraudulent conveyances were involved.—Cunningham v. Bright, 117 N.E. 909, 238 Mass. 385.

As the object of the attachment is to secure control of the property until the suit is terminated, a description which affords means of identification is sufficient."—Bradford Estate Co. v. Brown, 157 A. 874, 875, 52 R.I. 103.

Return held sufficient

A sheriff's return on an attachment writ, describing attached lots as being on the northwesterly corner of certain streets, giving lot numbers on assessor's plats, was sufficient.—Bradford Estate Co. v. Brown, 157 A. 874, 52 R.I. 103—6 C.J. p. 253 note 4 [a].

Reference to other documents. The property may be described by reference to the inventory and appraisement,[59] the petition for attachment, where the land sought to be subjected is described therein,[60] or the public records of the county.[61]

c. Showing as to Defendant's Ownership

The return should show that the property seized was attached as that of defendant, although in some jurisdictions this is not essential to the validity of the levy or return.

It is unquestionably the better practice for the return to state that the property seized was attached as belonging to defendant,[62] and in some jurisdictions it is held necessary that the return should show, either by express statement or necessary intendment, that such was the case,[63] or that he had an interest or ownership therein,[64] although a failure of the return so to state may be remedied by amendment at the proper time.[65] In other jurisdictions, however, such a statement is held not essential to the validity of the levy or return.[66]

d. Showing as to Value

The better practice is to return the approximate value of the property attached

Although it has been held that the return need not, in the absence of any statutory requirement to that effect, contain a valuation of the property attached,[67] yet, inasmuch as it is the officer's duty to seize a sufficient amount to cover the claim sued on, it would seem not only to be proper but also the better practice that the return show the approximate value of the property taken.[68]

e. Signature and Verification

The return should be signed, but in the absence of statutory requirement it need not be verified.

The officer should, of course, sign the return;[69] but it has been held that an omission of the officer's signature[70] or a wrong signature[71] is a defect which may be corrected by amendment.

Unless required by statute the return need not be verified.[72]

§ 249. Defects, Objections, and Waiver

a. Defects and irregularities in general
b. Aider of defects

a. Defects and Irregularities in General

Mere irregularities will not invalidate the return, although defects warranting its quashal invalidate not only the return but the levy and attachment. Objections may not be raised in collateral proceedings where jurisdiction exists independently of attachment.

The return to an attachment will not be invalidated by a mere irregularity or defect in form which in no way affects the substance thereof.[73] Accordingly, a mere misstatement in a return,[74] or a failure to state all the facts connected with the levy,[75] will not of itself defeat the legal effect of the levy or affect the jurisdiction of the court. But it has been held that a return defective in omitting a special description of the estate attached, in connection with the usual requisites of a return, will be supplanted by subsequent attachments, the returns of which do comply with the statute.[76]

Nonresident

"Where an attachment was sued out against a nonresident, and an entry of levy on realty was made by the sheriff, but he did not state in such entry that the property was levied on as that of the defendant, such levy was invalid and did not furnish a basis for a judgment against the property. . . . The fact that the sheriff included in his entry of levy the words, 'written notice given defendant,' was not sufficient to render the levy valid"—Sharp v Hall, 88 S E 929, 145 Ga 171—6 C J. p 254 note 9 [a]

Where a return is unnecessary the rights of the attaching creditor cannot be affected by a failure to describe certain property which was actually seized [77]

The quashing of a return on account of defects contained therein is in effect a quashing of the levy and a release of the property taken thereunder.[78]

Where jurisdiction to render judgment is not dependent on attachment, one may not complain in a collateral proceeding of the insufficiency of the return [79]

b. Aider of Defects

(1) By extrinsic evidence
(2) By presumption
(3) By waiver
(4) By judgment

(1) By Extrinsic Evidence

Ordinarily, the return may be aided by parol where, and only where, it shows attachment of designated property

Where the return clearly shows that certain property was attached, the performance by the officer of certain acts in connection therewith may be shown by parol evidence,[80] or by facts appearing elsewhere in the proceeding,[81] and parol evidence may be admitted in aid of a return showing constructive levy.[82] Parol evidence, however, is not admissible to show what property was attached when the return does not in some manner designate the property.[83]

In an action on two replevin bonds given by the same parties for the recovery of the same attached property, it has been held competent for plaintiff to show, by extraneous evidence, to which writ each of the bonds applied, where such fact did not appear from the return on the writ.[84]

(2) By Presumption

A return irregular in some respects, but set forth in language sufficiently definite to justify an intendment of regularity, may be deemed sufficient to show compliance with statutory requirements on the basis of the presumption that the officer performed his duty; although such presumption is rebuttable and will not be indulged to aid a return obviously obscure or otherwise clearly insufficient.

Since, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, an officer is presumed to have done his duty, the courts in many instances will presume that the statute has been complied with, if the return, although informal in some respects, is set forth in language sufficiently definite to justify an intendment of regularity, and there is no affirmative evidence of an omission [85] Accordingly, it has been held that, where the return properly describes the property levied on, it will be presumed, although not expressly stated, that such property was attached as the property of defendant in attachment,[86] and an obscurity or irregularity in the date will be considered in connection with the date of the writ, and not understood as prior thereto [87] When, however, the obscurity of the return is such that its import cannot be ascertained with reasonable certainty, the court will not indulge in mere conjectural construction in order to make it effective;[88] and, where the statute requires a full return of all the officer's proceedings on or before the return day of the writ, it will not be presumed that he levied on any property other than that which he specified in the return.[89]

(3) By Waiver

Formal defects and irregularities in the return may be waived, but defects showing the levy to be void are not properly the subject of waiver.

Defendant in attachment waives any formal defects or irregularities in the return where he appears generally,[90] and admits the fact of levy in his answer[91] or by reading an amended return in support of his motion to vacate the attachment in the trial court.[92]

An intervener who consents to the property remaining in the custody of the attaching officer, and who joins in a delivery bond for it, waives the irregularities in a return affecting the validity of the levy.[93]

A vendee who sues for the recovery of property attached as the vendor's before the date at which the writ is returnable cannot subsequently avail himself of a defect in the return.[94]

Where the levy is void for failure of the return to show that the sheriff went on the land and there declared a levy, as required by the statute, such defect is not waived by defendant's failure to urge the objection, and a subsequent lienholder may raise it.[95]

(4) By Judgment

Defects in a return may be cured by recitals in the judgment.

Defects in the description of attached property contained in the return may, it has been held, be cured by a judgment which contains a full and proper description.[96]

§ 250. Amendment

a. In general
b. Time of amendment
c. Notice to adverse party
d. Effect of amendment

a. In General

The return may be amended to show the real facts; although the right to amendment is restricted to cases wherein the steps essential to a valid attachment have been taken but error in detailing them has supervened.

The return to a writ of attachment, as well as the inventory, may be amended so as to show the real facts[97]

The officer may amend without leave of court where he acts in time, as will be explained in subsection b of this section; or in a proper case amendment of the return may be made pursuant to leave of court Thus, it is within the power of the court to allow the officer to amend his return,[98] and leave to make an amendment may be granted on the application of either the officer or an interested party.[99] Such leave will be granted, however, only where the return as amended shows legal service,[1] and then only where there is sufficient on record to enable the court reasonably to infer that the amendment is in accord with the facts,[2] and merely affects the evidence, and not

(1) Where a sheriff's return to an order of attachment showed a levy, and a return to defendant on giving of forthcoming bond, but omitted to describe the property, an amendment should have been allowed for that purpose.—Larimore v. Parker, 168 P 359, 101 Kan 729.

the fact, of service.[3] In other words, amendments in the return can be allowed only where all the steps to be pursued have been taken, but some error in detailing them has supervened,[4] and amendment will be denied where the steps essential to a valid attachment have not been taken so that the proposed amendment would not make the return accord with the actual facts.[5]

Statutes expressly permitting amendment. Statutes providing that in attachment cases the levying officer shall have the right to amend his return by supplying any omissions or errors, and that the court before which the attachment shall be returned shall have power to order amendment, are remedial in their nature and should be liberally construed.[6]

Amendment which would release the property attached and included within the original return should not be allowed.[7]

b. Time of Amendment

(1) In general
(2) After expiration of officer's term
(3) After intervention of rights of third persons

(1) In General

An amendment of a return should be made in apt time, and what is apt time will, ordinarily, rest in the sound discretion of the trial court as exercised under the circumstances of the particular case

Generally speaking, after the court has acquired jurisdiction in attachment, the return may be amended either at the return term or at the trial term and before judgment.[8]

While it has been held that an officer has an absolute right to amend his return, to conform to the facts, at any time before the cause is submitted to the jury,[9] the better rule seems to be that he can amend without leave of the court only before the return becomes a part of the record, and after that time leave of court must be obtained.[10] By leave of court the return may, it has been held, be amended after the return day,[11] after verdict,[12] before or after judgment, in the trial court's discretion,[13] or after an appeal has been taken.[14]

Thus, the mere fact that a considerable length of time has elapsed,[15] that the suit has been begun,[16] or that a judgment has been rendered[17] will not itself preclude an amendment of the return in attachment; but an officer should not be permitted to amend his return on a writ of attachment after the lapse of a considerable time, where he trusts merely to memory, and the amendment will add to his return a statement which, if untrue, cannot be disproved, and is, as to a fact, not likely to have impressed his memory.[18]

(2) After Expiration of Officer's Term

By leave of court an attaching officer may amend his return after expiration of his term of office.

The fact that the term of office of the officer who executed and returned a writ of attachment has expired will not as a rule prevent the court's exercising its discretion in allowing an amendment of the return.[19]

(3) After Intervention of Rights of Third Persons

Generally speaking, the return may not be amended after the rights of innocent third persons have intervened.

As a rule, an amendment of a return to a writ of attachment cannot be permitted where the rights of innocent third persons, acquired previous thereto, would be injuriously affected thereby;[20] but the mere fact that defendant has made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors will not preclude a subsequent amendment of the return, since the assignee takes subject to existing equities.[21]

c. Notice to Adverse Party

Notice of a proposed amendment should be given where jurisdiction would be affected or where extrinsic evidence forms the basis of amendment.

Notice of a proposed amendment of the return must be given to the parties who would be affected thereby where the amendment would affect the jurisdiction,[22] or where the record does not furnish the necessary data for the amendment and an extrinsic showing is required.[23]

d. Effect of Amendment

An amended return replaces the imperfect one, and relates back to the date of the original unless the rights of innocent third persons intervene. An unnecessary amendment is mere surplusage barren of effect.

The amended return takes the place of the imperfect one,[24] and, as a rule, the amendment relates back to the time of the original return,[25] although it will not do so to the injury of the intervening rights of an innocent third person.[26]

Amendments not necessary to the validity of the return are merely surplusage, and the time of such amendments does not affect the date as of which the attachment became a lien, which question is controlled by the date of the original and valid return and not that of the unnecessary amendment.[27]

§ 251. Recording

a. Necessity
b. Place of recording
c. Sufficiency of copy or record
d. Effect of filing or record

a. Necessity

Broadly speaking, an unrecorded attachment return is good as between the parties, but not as against subsequent innocent purchasers or creditors.

Where the statute so requires, a copy of the writ and descriptive part of the return must be recorded, in case of the attachment of realty or bulky personalty, as an essential to the creation and preservation of the attachment lien,[28] at least as against subsequent purchasers,[29] or subsequent attaching creditors.[30]

In any event, compliance with statutory requirements as to recording is necessary only to the creation of the lien,[31] an unrecorded attachment is valid between the parties, and as against all other persons except subsequent attaching creditors or subsequent purchasers in good faith and for value,[32] and an attachment is not invalidated as against defendant by failure to return a copy of the writ with the levy indorsed thereon to the county clerk for registration as required by the statute.[33] It has also been held that the officer is not bound to file the writ or a copy thereof with the clerk.[34]

b. Place of Recording

To be effective, the return should be recorded at the place designated by statute.

The return must be filed and recorded at the place prescribed by the statute,[35] and a recording

Statute construed as permitting record in county other than that where suit is pending

Although not directly authorizing it, Vernon's Sayles Civ St Annot. (1914) art 6858, providing for record of attachment in the county where the land is located, impliedly authorizes the sheriff to certify a copy of the writ of attachment levied in a county other than that in which suit was pending—Farmers' Nat Bank v. Collis, (Tex Civ App.) 197 S W. 782, error refused.

at a place other than that specified is a nullity.[36]

Docket in which recorded. Statutes governing record of an attachment levy by the court clerk have been held in pari materia with statutes relating to lis pendens, so that such statutes should be construed together,[37] and under such a construction it has been held that an attachment recorded in the judgment docket and indexed is a lien on the property attached, although a lis pendens was never filed in a separate book labeled as such.[38]

c. Sufficiency of Copy or Record

The copy placed on the record should designate the parties, describe the property attached, show its ownership, correspond with the original in all material respects, and, generally, should comply with applicable statutory provisions.

The copy placed on the record should designate the parties,[39] and contain a description of the property sufficient to identify it[40] and show the ownership thereof.[41] Where the property attached is personalty, the record need not expressly state that it is too bulky to be removed,[42] at least where the description clearly shows that such is the case.[43] Where the copy varies from the original in an unimportant detail, the defect is not fatal,[44] but where it materially varies from the original,[45] or where the copy is such that the original, if like it, would be altogether void,[46] it will not constitute notice. Where the statute requires the officer to file a statement of the sum sued for, a mere statement of the ad damnum of the writ is insufficient,[47] although if the amount claimed exceeds the ad damnum, such a statement would, it seems, be sufficient.[48] Where the statute requires a statement of the "value of defendant's property," filing a statement of the "sum sued for" is insufficient.[49] The copy filed must be duly attested where so required by statute.[50]

d. Effect of Filing or Record

Recording is designed to afford notice of attachment to third persons.

The purpose of the recording is to give the public notice of the attachment,[51] and, where it is the duty of the clerk to make the proper entry, it has been held that the constructive notice is complete when the copy is entered in the proper book, although the entry is not indexed.[52] Where the statute merely requires the officer to leave a copy with the clerk, it would seem that constructive notice is complete when the copy is so left, although the clerk neglects to record it, or makes an insufficient record thereof.[53] It has been held that the rights of a subsequent lienor without notice of the attachment prevail over an attachment levied and filed for record before such lienor's rights arose but actually recorded by the clerk after such rights arose, the theory of the decision being that the lien of the attachment did not arise until actual recording was completed,[54] although other authority is to the effect that when the original attaching creditor has done all that the law

Realty

Where the statute requires an attachment of realty to be recorded in the district where the land lies, filing the attachment in a different district within the same county is ineffectual and does not constitute a recording in compliance with the statute—In re Lyon Carpet Co., (D C Mass.) 25 F (2d) 509.

Sufficiency of indexing

Under Vernon's Sayles Civ.St Annot (1914) art 6858, where the clerk duly indexed the names of several parties to suit wherein land was attached, it was held that the record was sufficient, although the heading of the writ when filed did not recite the names of some of the parties, the name of defendant whose land was attached being given—Farmers' Nat Bank v. requires of him, failure of the clerk to record the certificate will not invalidate an attachment of realty, even as against a subsequent purchaser for value and without notice.[55]

As bearing on possession or right to possession. Where an officer has attached personal property on a writ, and has filed an attested copy of his return with the town clerk under the statute, he does not deprive himself of the right to gain actual possession of the property attached and to remove it when necessary for its preservation, and as such filing is merely one mode of preserving an attachment already made, it does not follow therefrom that the officer has not taken possession of the property.[56]

Copy of attachment on file as evidence. In a collateral proceeding a party cannot prove the existence of his attachment lien by means of a copy of the attachment on file in the office of the register of deeds, but must offer the original attachment in evidence.[57]

§ 252. Operation and Effect of Return

a. As evidence generally
b. Persons and matters concluded
c. Construction of return

a. As Evidence Generally

The return is competent evidence and prima facie proof of the facts recited therein, although subject to impeachment.

The return to a writ of attachment is competent evidence to prove the fact and manner of the levy[58] and the nature of the property taken thereunder,[59] and is at least prima facie evidence of the facts recited therein,[60] although it is subject to impeachment.[61]

When levy made subject to other levies. The return of an officer, that he made the attachment subject to other attachments, is evidence of the order in which the writs were served,[62] but is by no means conclusive as to the validity of a former levy.[63]

b. Persons and Matters Concluded

(1) Persons
(2) Matters

(1) Persons

(a) Parties or privies
(b) Levying officer
(c) Strangers

(a) Parties or Privies

Subject to certain qualifications, it may be stated as a general rule that the return to a writ of attachment is conclusive on the parties and their privies.

As a general rule, the return of the officer to a writ of attachment is conclusive as to the parties to the proceeding and those claiming under them, and cannot be contradicted by them[64] in any collateral manner[65] for the purpose of invalidating the officer's proceedings,[66] defeating any rights acquired thereunder,[67] or avoiding a liability fixed on a party thereby.[68] This rule is not, however, universal; but the limits within which it is applicable are distinctly marked by the reason and object of it,[69] and there are many cases, to be found in the books, where it has been held not to apply,[70] as in the case of matters not truly tending to impeach the return.[71]

(b) Levying Officer

Generally speaking, an officer's return to a writ of attachment is conclusive against him as to matters of fact recited therein but it is not conclusive in his favor.

The return is generally held conclusive against the officer by whom it was made,[72] and cannot be contradicted by him;[73] but this rule is not universal,[74] and does not apply to statements which are mere matters of opinion,[75] nor preclude the officer from proving facts dehors his return and not inconsistent therewith.[76] The return is not conclusive in favor of the attaching officer,[77] although an impeachment will not be allowed where the impeaching evidence would be immaterial.[78]

(c) Strangers

Against strangers the return constitutes only prima facie evidence.

As a general rule, the return of the levying officer is at most prima facie evidence only, and not conclusive as against strangers.[79]

(2) Matters

(a) Quantity of goods seized
(b) Ownership of property
(c) Value of property
(d) Matters not necessary to be returned

(a) Quantity of Goods Seized

Return recitals respecting quantities attached are not conclusive

A sheriff's return is not conclusive as to the quantity of goods seized under the attachment.[80]

(b) Ownership of Property

The return affords prima facie, but impeachable, proof of ownership.

The return of the attaching officer is not conclusive on anyone as to the ownership of the property attached,[81] and while as against the officer it furnishes prima facie proof of ownership,[82] the officer may show that the property levied on and returned as that of the debtor was not in fact the property of the debtor.[83]

(c) Value of Property

The return is merely prima facie evidence of value.

An officer's return is admissible as prima facie evidence of the value of the property attached, but is not conclusive on either the officer or the parties to the action and their privies, and is subject to be overcome by parol evidence of a different value.[84]

(d) Matters Not Necessary to Be Returned

The return is not conclusive as to recitals of unnecessary facts.

The return of any collateral fact not necessary to be returned in order to render the proceedings valid is not conclusive on the officer or the parties, but may be traversed,[85] and accordingly, an unnecessary recital of facts and circumstances attending the levy may be contradicted.[86]

c. Construction of Return

Returns have been held subject to a rule of strict construction.

It has been held that the return on an attachment should be strictly construed.[87]

§ 253. Effect of Failure to Make Return

Failure to make return excludes the property from legal custody and renders the attaching officer a trespasser; although such failure creates no presumption against service of the writ, and lack of proper return does not discharge the lien.

The officer becomes a trespasser ab initio when he fails to return the writ under which he levied on and seized property,[88] but the failure to return an attachment has been held to afford no presumption that it has not been served, so as to justify the court in issuing a second attachment.[89] Return of attachment being necessary to make it lawful ab initio, the property attached in the absence of return cannot be regarded as in custodia legis during the life of the writ.[90] It has been held, however, that the lien is not discharged by the failure to make a proper return.[91]

VIII. CREATION, NATURE, AND DURATION OF LIEN, AND PRIORITIES

§ 254. Creation and Existence of Lien

A valid attachment creates a lien on the property attached.

An attachment creates a lien or encumbrance on the property attached,[92] especially when levied on the property and certainly after it is carried into a decree,[93] which lien is perfected when the at-

Prima facie case of value shown

Where, in an action against a sheriff, plaintiff introduces the sheriff's return of the writ of attachment, reciting that he levied on certain property of the judgment debtor and swore two householders to appraise its value, and the value is so found and determined by the householders, a prima facie case of the value of the property at the time of the levy is presented.—Foster v. Wooley, 220 P 938, 93 Okl. 53.

Seizure creates lien

(1) It is the seizure of the property under attachment proceedings that creates the lien on the property.—Bigelow v Andress, 31 Ill. 322—Slattery v. P. L. Renoudet Lumber Co., 87 So. 888, 125 Miss. 229

(2) Where an officer takes possession of personal property by virtue of a writ of attachment, plaintiff thereby gains a lien on it.—Perry v. Griefen, 59 A. 601, 99 Me. 420.

Proceedings against nonresident

The only lien created in attachment against a nonresident, who is not served, is that arising by virtue of the seizure of the property levied on.—Owens v Atlanta Trust, etc., Co., 47 S.E. 215, 119 Ga. 924.

tachment suit ends in a judgment for plaintiff[94] and may be made available to the creditor.[95] This lien does not depend on possession;[96] it is created by operation of law,[97] and is solely a creature of statute and can be created only in the cases in which the legislature by statutory enactment has authorized its creation.[98] There must be a valid attachment to create a valid lien.[99] Substantial compliance with the procedural requirements established by statute is a prerequisite to the creation of a valid lien;[1] and, where compliance with a rule requiring the filing of a certificate, copy of the writ, or other paper is necessary in order to constitute a valid levy (see supra §§ 223-232), until the rule is complied with the attachment is not a lien on the property,[2] at least as against a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee without actual notice,[3] but constructive notice is complete with the performance thereof (see supra § 251), and the lien is not defeated by the failure of the officer properly to index the record.[4] Also any conditions prerequisite to the right to attach specified classes of property must be complied with or a lien will not be created by an attempted levy thereon,[5] but, where the procedural requirements are complied with, the validity of the lien is not affected by any question as to whether such attachment was wrongfully sued out or not.[6]

§ 255. —— Date of Origin

Generally the lien of an attachment dates from the time the writ is actually levied, although in some jurisdictions it dates from the time the writ is placed in the officer's hands for service, or, if filing is necessary, from the time the writ is filed.

In various states the lien attaches at different stages in the proceedings. The prevailing doctrine is that the lien dates from the time when the writ of attachment is levied, or, as the proposition is often stated, the title of the purchaser of attached property at an execution sale relates back to the time of levy,[7] irrespective of when the judg-

Mere institution of an action for a debt and the suing out of an attachment do not create a lien on property described in the petition, and on which the attachment is levied, if the attachment is invalid, because the affidavit required by the code was not made before it was issued. Such a proceeding does not create a lis pendens lien.—Meyer v. Ruff, 16 S.W. 84, 13 Ky.L. 254.

Date of filing bill immaterial
An attachment lien does not relate back to the date of the filing of bill, ment is recovered,[8] but in some jurisdictions the lien is held to arise as soon as the writ is placed in the sheriff's hands for service.[9]

Filing or recording of attachment. Where the filing of a certificate, copy of the writ, or the like in a designated public office is necessary to complete a levy (see supra §§ 223, 232), the lien dates from the time when such certificate or copy of the writ is filed.[10]

Where affidavit is amended. The amendment of a merely irregular affidavit does not affect the time of the commencement of the lien.[11]

Where petition is amended. Where a merely defective petition in an attachment proceeding is amended, so as to perfect the action and not present a new cause of action, the amendment relates back to the filing of the petition, and the lien of the attachment is preserved from that time, even against the lien of subsequent attachers of the same property.[12] So, where an amendment enlarges plaintiff's claim, if there is no fraudulent intent and a new cause of action or claim is not included therein, it does not render the attachment invalid as against attachments levied before the amendment was made, except that, unless the difference between the sum claimed in the original complaint and that claimed in the amended complaint is the result of a mere clerical error, the lien of the attachment will extend only to the sum claimed in the original complaint.[13] However, in so far as the amendment sets up a new cause of action[14] or describes additional property not mentioned in the original petition,[15] it only takes effect from the time of filing it as to persons acquiring a lien or interest in the property by purchase or attachment; for, as to the new cause, such persons are not pendente lite purchasers.

Second attachment. A second attachment binds the debtor's interest from the time when it is levied,[16] and, after a first attachment is abandoned, a second attaching creditor cannot obtain priority over an intervening purchaser by tacking his lien to that of the previous attachment,[17] nor, where there is, in the same suit, more than one affidavit and attachment, based on different grounds, does the lien of the later attachments relate back to the first.[18] However, under a statute which allows a creditor who files his demand subsequent to the commencement of the attachment suit to become a party to the action and places all creditors of the attachment debtor, who file claims in the attachment suit, on an equal footing, the lien of the first attachment applies to all valid demands thereafter filed under that process.[19]

Former rule

Under the attachment law of 1843 which did not allow a creditor who had filed his demand subsequent to the commencement of the attachment suit to become a party to the action, but under which each claim stood as an independent suit, the lien of subsequent claims commenced as early as they were filed.—Ziegenhager v. Doe, 1 Ind 296.

§ 256. Nature of Lien

An attachment lien, although inchoate in the sense that its enforcement depends on the creditor obtaining final judgment on his claim, is an actual and substantial security which confers vested rights on the holder thereof.

The lien created by a valid attachment is a statutory lien[20] It is not an interest in property,[21] nor is it of the same binding force as a judgment lien.[22] In a strict sense, it is not a fixed lien on property,[23] but is only a right to obtain payment out of the property attached in preference to others,[24] which right is inchoate or contingent[25] until the creditor has obtained final judgment in the attachment suit,[26] and, if, on final adjudication, no liability is adjudged against a defendant, there is no lien against his property.[27] However, the lien or security obtained by an attachment, even before judgment, is a fixed and positive security,[28] a specific lien,[29] and, although whether it will ever be made available to the creditor depends on contingencies,[30] its existence is in no way contingent, conditional, or inchoate[31] It is a vested interest,[32] an actual and substantial security,[33] affording specific security for satisfaction of the debt put in suit,[34] which constitutes a cloud on the legal title,[35] and is as specific as if created by virtue of a voluntary act of the debtor and stands upon as high equitable grounds as a mortgage lien.[36] It has also been held that the right acquired by an attachment of property is sufficient to justify the attaching creditor in filing a bill in equity to clear the property from adverse claims,[37] or to preserve the lien of the attachment when necessary papers have been lost and cannot be supplied,[38] or in applying for an injunction against the sale of the property under an execution issued on a subsequent judgment,[39] or, as appears in the title Fraudulent Conveyances § 331 b (4) [27 C.J. p. 733 note 10–p 744 note 14], in bringing an action to set aside a conveyance claimed to have been fraudulently made, without waiting until the indebtedness is reduced to judgment, although no decree setting aside such conveyance should be entered until the indebtedness is definitely established by judgment.

§ 257. Extent of Lien

The property and interest therein covered by the lien and the amount for which the property is bound are hereafter considered in sections 258, 259.

§ 258. —— Property or Interest Covered

a. Property covered
b. Interest covered

a. Property Covered

Subject to the rules as to the conversion of property from one form into another and of the right to the proceeds of the sale of property attached, an attachment lien covers only the actual property levied on.

As a general rule an attachment lien covers only the property which was levied on under the writ[40] Where one tract is attached the court cannot, even by rule, substitute a different tract;[41] nor will a description of property as land in an attachment include and bind a leasehold under an oil and gas lease[42] However, unless it affirmatively appears to the contrary, directly or by implication, a water right is attached equally with the land to which it is appurtenant, although the land alone is specified in the writ or return of attachment,[43] and an attachment lien on the personal property of a lessee of an oil and gas lease will cover oil and gas well drilling equipment which by the terms of the lease was the property of the lessee and removable by him at any time,[44] so, also, a levy on an oil lease will attach a lien to the oil in place as severed from the realty by the operation of the lease.[45] The levy of a purchase-money attachment subjects only the property described in the affidavit, or, in case it has been sold by the original purchaser, any purchase money thus due;[46] and an attachment of a residuary legatee's interest in the personal property of an estate will not cover cash obtained by the subsequent conversion of realty belonging to the estate into cash.[47] Service of attachment on a codefendant who is named in the attachment as a person indebted to, or in possession of property belonging to, the principal defendant gives plaintiff a lien on any debt then owed to the principal defendant by the codefendant and on any property of the principal defendant then in the possession of codefendant, but not on any indebtedness of codefendant to the principal defendant which accrues after service of the attachment or on any of the principal defendant's property which comes into the possession of codefendant after such service.[48]

Books of account. A levy of attachment on books of account is not equivalent to a levy on the debts charged therein, and creates no lien on such debts,[49] in the absence of statute.[50] In an action against a nonresident defendant insurance company under a statute which provides that an attachment shall bind the effects or indebtedness, an attachment of effects in the hands of resident agents having moneys, property, and effects of defendant includes and binds premiums due on policies written prior to the service of process but collected subsequent thereto, such books of account and evidences of debt constituting effects.[51]

Increase or income from property. An attachment lien extends to dividends declared on corporate stock[52] or dividends or interest declared on deposits in a savings bank,[53] after an attachment thereof, although, as to the latter, there is authority otherwise.[54] In regard to rents and profits, the authorities are not agreed, some holding the lien to extend to them,[55] and others, that they are not subject to the lien of the attachment.[56]

Where the attached property is sold under an order of court[57] in partition proceedings,[58] on foreclosure of a mortgage,[59] or by agreement between the owner and the attaching creditor,[60] the attachment lien will bind the proceeds of the sale, or the surplus proceeds in case the sale was under a lien prior to the attachment, and the attached property passes free from the lien which subsequently affects the proceeds only,[61] also, where land was sold under an escrow agreement under the terms of which title did not pass until a time subsequent to a levy of attachment on such real estate, the attachment created a lien on payments made subsequent thereto.[62]

b. Interest Covered

Subject to the rules laid down in certain of the registration acts, an attachment lien encumbers only the debtor's interest in the property levied on, existing at the time of the levy.

Except in so far as registration statutes make the attachment lien effective against outstanding unrecorded conveyances or encumbrances (see infra § 276), such lien covers only the actual interest of the debtor in the property levied on,[64] existing at the time of the levy,[65] and cannot extend to an interest subsequently acquired by him,[66] or an interest which, prior to the time of the levy, he lost or transferred [67] The lien will not attach to the mere legal title to land when the equitable estate is in another,[68] especially where the creditor has knowledge of the facts.[69] An attachment against property as belonging to a copartnership does not, where it in fact belongs to a partner in his individual capacity, establish a lien thereon prior to the lien of an attachment, levied thereon as the individual estate of the partner at a time subsequent to the levy against the property as copartnership property and prior to the time the action against the copartnership was changed by amendment to one against the partner individually.[70] A person possesses such an interest in property after it has been sold by the sheriff under judicial process but before acknowledgment of the deed that an attachment thereon will create a lien sufficient to hold any balance left in the sheriff's

Executor's commissions

Attachment on judgment against an executor laid in the hands of coexecutors could prevail against garnishees only to the extent of the judgment debtor's share of the coexecutors' commissions, and would be abortive, if the judgment debtor was not entitled to any part of the commissions—Hohman v. Orem, (Md.) 182 A 587

Nonexistent profits

Where the debtor's interest in an attached car of lumber was the excess value over the cost and labor of manufacture, and there was no excess, his creditor obtained nothing by attachment, notwithstanding the owner furnishing logs had not been paid before a prior car was shipped. —McRae v Hammond, 59 S W (2d) 497, 187 Ark 329

Transfer of land

Where prior to levy of attachment judgment debtor surrendered his interest in land he held, under contract to purchase, to a third party in satisfaction of a loan, the attachment impressed no lien on such land—Graves v Arizona Cent. Bank, 272 P. 1063, 205 Cal 715.

If all title and interest has passed from the debtor to a third person at the time of the levy the attaching creditor gets nothing by the levy—Pacific Nat Bank v. Western Pac. R. Co, 108 P. 676, 157 Cal 573, 27 L R. A (N S) 987, 21 Ann Cas. 1391—Short v. Karnop, 275 P 278, 84 Mont. 276.

hands after distribution of the moneys received under the sale.[71]

§ 259. —— Amount for Which Property Bound

The authorities differ as to whether the attachment lien is limited to the amount stated in the writ, the amount due at the time of the levy, or the amount for which judgment is finally obtained, and the costs.

While it has been held that the levy of an attachment binds the property, not merely for the amount which will discharge plaintiff's claim at the time of the levy, but for the amount of the judgment which he may thereafter obtain, and the costs, if any accrue, under the execution issued to enforce it,[72] there is also authority for the view that the lien of the attachment is restricted to the amount claimed in the writ or warrant, because sound policy requires that the extent of the lien shall be known as soon as it exists, in order to preserve the rights of third parties and prevent unnecessary restrictions on the sale of property.[73] The amount actually due on plaintiff's demand at the time of service of the attachment has been held to fix a limit beyond which the lien of an attachment cannot extend,[74] so that a judgment by collusion between the debtor and the attaching creditor for a larger amount than the original claim would not affect injuriously the rights of intervening purchasers,[75] and adding to the original demand and taking judgment for a larger sum than that claimed in the affidavit with knowledge of an intervening sale has been held to destroy the lien entirely,[76] but on the other hand, it has been held that, in the absence of intervening rights of third persons, a lien against property seized under attachment may be decreed for the judgment recovered against a defendant personally served, although it exceeds the sum for which the writ was issued.[77] The right of an officer to attach a single indivisible article of personal property, like a vessel, although of much greater value than the amount he is directed to attach on his precept, must be sustained of necessity where no other or sufficient property to satisfy his precept can be found, or is shown to him by the debtor, but such an attachment creates a lien only to the amount required to be attached under the precept, and can be released by a bond in the penal sum of the ad damnum of the writ.[78]

§ 260. Duration of Lien in General

Subject to express statutory enactments thereon, an attachment lien, unless terminated by dissolution or judgment for the defendant, continues until judgment and thereafter on personalty for a reasonable time to allow the issue and levy of execution, and on realty it merges in the judgment lien and continues for its duration.

An attachment lien ordinarily continues until the final determination of the case,[79] unless terminated by a dissolution of the attachment (see infra § 472), or judgment for defendant in the main action (see infra § 268), or unless the debtor appears and gives other and better security than the property affords as by furnishing a good and sufficient bond.[80] If the attachment lien is on real estate, it continues until judgment in the suit has been entered and docketed,[81] when, except in so far as is necessary to preserve the priority of lien acquired,[82] it, in a sense, merges in the judgment lien;[83] and, except as it is regulated by express

Extent of merger

"The lien of the attachment on real property is not completely extinguished by the judgment, but such lien ceases in all respects, except to maintain the priority created and merges in the lien of the judgment, in the sense and to the extent that there are not then two separate and distinct and subsisting liens against the same property."—Balzano v. Traeger, 270 P. 249, 250, 93 Cal App 640.

statutory enactment, which in some states limits the lien to the same period as that provided for in the case of personal property,[84] and, in others, fixes a somewhat longer period,[85] its duration is the duration of the judgment itself,[86] the lien continuing until it is merged and the title obtained by a sale under the execution issued on the judgment obtained by plaintiff, or until the judgment is satisfied, or the attachment is discharged or vacated in some manner provided by law.[87] If the attachment lien is on personal property, in the absence of statute it will continue for a reasonable time after judgment to allow the issue and levy of an execution,[88] but by the entry of judgment and the issuance of the execution thereon the attachment is merged in the execution, the lien acquired by the attachment being preserved only to enable such lien to be enforced under execution.[89] In the New England states the duration of the attachment lien after final judgment is regulated by express statutory enactments which set a fixed time for its continuance[90] or require that execution must issue during the same term that final judgment in the attachment suit is recovered and must be levied on the attached property before the return day of the execution.[91] A failure to issue execution[92] or to levy on the attached property thereunder[93] within the time limited by statute results in the loss of the lien, even though the judgment is by default,[94] but, where execution is stayed, this will continue the attachment lien beyond the statutory period,[95] and it has been held that the statutory period does not run where a levy is prevented by the possession of a receiver under a stipulation.[96]

Where mortgaged property is attached and under a statutory provision the attaching creditor is ordered to pay the mortgagee the amount due on his mortgage, the attachment remains in force until the creditor's failure to pay the amount directed within the time fixed.[97]

Extension of lien. A statute providing for the extension of attachment liens has been construed to refer only to existing liens, and to have no application to attachment liens which have either expired by operation of law or have otherwise ceased to exist prior to the making of a motion for their extension.[98] Where the statute requires the motion for the extension of the attachment lien to be made in the court in which the action is pending, the trial court alone has jurisdiction to extend the lien and a motion therefor must be made before it, notwithstanding the pendency of an appeal, where the appeal does not embrace the question of the expiration of the attachment[99] and the issuance of a writ of supersedeas thereunder.[1]

§ 261. Release or Discharge

A release or discharge of an attachment lien involves a final relinquishment of claim.

Final judgment

The final judgment mentioned in a statute providing that no real estate shall be held by virtue of an attachment longer than thirty days, next after the day on which final judgment was rendered in the suit, in which the same was attached, to be taken in execution, probably means one from which no appeal is taken, such a judgment being final on the matters in controversy, if litigated, and also on default.—Leighton v. Reed, 28 Me. 87.

1. Palmer v. Fix, supra.

A release or discharge of an attachment or attachment lien involves the actual relinquishment of all future claim to the property concerned and the proceeds thereof.[2]

§ 262. —— By Act of Creditor or His Attorney

a. In general
b Waiver or abandonment
c Effect of abandonment

a. In General

The attachment creditor or his attorney may release the attachment without an order of court

Plaintiff in attachment or his attorney,[3] generally, has the right to release an attachment lien on property[4] without a court order,[5] and where the case involves an attachment on real estate they alone have the power to make such a release.[6] The mere destruction of the papers by plaintiff after an attachment is levied is not, however, a competent method of ending the proceedings and discharging the lien, but the papers should be sent to court and a disposal made thereof.[7] Where, however, the rights of third persons depend on the continuance of the attachment suit under statutes providing for pro rata distribution among attaching creditors, no release of the attachment can be made to the detriment of subsequent applying creditors.[8] Accordingly, the right of other attaching creditors cannot be affected by the action of one in filing his claim against an assignee,[9] accepting the position of assignee under a deed of trust,[10] or giving assent to a deed of trust for the benefit of all creditors.[11]

b. Waiver or Abandonment

An attachment lien may be lost by the attaching creditor's conduct in waiving or abandoning his rights therein, but such action will not be presumed and must be proved by the party asserting it

An attachment lien may be lost by delay or other conduct on the part of the attaching creditor which operates to waive or abandon his rights thereunder,[12] such as failing to enter the writ of attachment at the return time thereof,[13] failing to serve summons in the action on defendant,[14] failing to

Bringing new process of attachment

Where a writ of attachment which had been levied was lost, plaintiff by beginning proceedings anew abandoned the original attachment and proceedings thereunder.—Smith v. Wilson, 128 So 632, 13 La App 679, reversing 125 So. 302, 13 La App 437.

Some affirmative act of the creditor, inconsistent with the continuance of the lien, must be shown before an attachment lien will be deemed abandoned.—Stillman v. Hamer, 78 P 836, 70 Kan. 469, 109 Am S R. 465

Delay in service of summons

Where the action had already begun when the attachment therein was prosecute the suit to judgment and execution with proper diligence,[15] failing or refusing to give to the sheriff indemnity rightfully demanded by him,[16] allowing the sheriff to return "no property found" on an execution issued in the attachment suit,[17] assenting to a subsequent assignment by the debtor for the benefit of creditors[18] or a conveyance of the property in trust,[19] purchasing the property at a sale under other process subsequently levied,[20] entering into general submission to arbitration of all demands between himself and defendant[21] or settling or adjusting the suit,[22] or proving the claim in aid of which the attachment was sued out in bankruptcy proceedings,[23] or proving the claim against the debtor's assignee for the benefit of creditors[24] or against the estate after his death.[25] If the creditor, after attaching mortgaged personal property, discontinues his proceeding against the trustee appearing or the trustee is discharged by the court, the attachment is dissolved.[26] On the return of an execution wholly unsatisfied, there is no execution in force and thus no lien on the property by virtue of either the attachment or the execution,[27] unless the failure to obtain satisfaction of the execution was caused by a fraudulent obstruction as a fraudulent conveyance or transfer of the property.[28]

Presumptions and burden of proof. The law does not favor the abandonment or forfeiture of an attachment,[29] but the presumption is that the lien continues.[30] Since the law does not favor or presume abandonments, it is incumbent on the party who asserts an abandonment of the attachment to establish the fact.[31]

No waiver or abandonment of the lien is shown by the conduct of the attaching creditor in taking out a general execution on his judgment in the attachment suit,[32] failing to proceed after deliver-levied, neither the attachment nor the action was, as a matter of law, abandoned by the delay in the service of the summons—Wagner v Farmers' Co-op Exch Co of Good Thunder, 180 N.W. 231, 147 Minn 376, 14 A.L.R. 279.

Abandonment of first attachment held a waiver of lien thereunder

Where a creditor files a complaint and causes an attachment to be issued and levied on real estate of a nonresident, but fails to serve the summons or take any further steps in the action, and a year and nine months after commences a new action against the same nonresident on the same cause of action, and levies a new attachment on the same real estate and prosecutes such action to judgment, he is deemed to have abandoned his first action and to have waived any lien under his first attachment.—Union Inv Co v. Further levy precluded

ing the attachment,[33] filing a claim bond,[34] staying execution on attached real estate,[35] agreeing to retain the attachment against a part of the land sufficient to cover the judgment,[36] substituting in place of plaintiff a partnership of which he is a member,[37] accepting payment on a contract assignment taken to perfect the attachment,[38] entering into an agreement for the sale of the property for the benefit of all concerned,[39] joining in a proceeding to have the debtor declared insolvent,[40] or having the debtor arrested or committed;[41] nor does levying a second writ of attachment against the same property as a precautionary measure show an abandonment of the first levy;[42] nor having a return of nulla bona on a first execution after judgment;[43] and it has been held that a creditor who had obtained a lien on real estate by an attachment in chancery did not waive the same by levying an execution thereupon under a judgment which he had subsequently obtained in an action at law.[44] Where a suit was brought against a nonresident by attachment, plaintiff's failure properly to enter his judgment when recovered in the judgment lien docket has been held not to operate as a waiver of his attachment lien,[45] and it has also been held that delay in the institution of proceedings to enforce an attachment lien, which could not have given rise to an inference of an abandonment of the lien, and which resulted in no advantage to the attaching creditor or injury to the opposing party, does not constitute such laches as will bar the right to enforce the lien.[46] Therefore, unless a presumption of laches is justified or defendant is prejudiced by such delay, a mere failure by plaintiff to assert his rights under an attachment is not sufficient to cause a loss of lien.[47] An attaching creditor will not be deemed to have abandoned his attachment lien by his refusal to continue paying a watchman, where he thought such a keeper unnecessary for the attached property because of its bulk, weight, and situation.[48] A temporary absence on the part of a caretaker placed in charge of property by the attaching officer does not constitute an abandonment,[49] and where an attaching creditor instructed the sheriff to leave the goods in the possession of the debtor following an attachment in good faith, there is no constructive abandonment of the levy.[50] An agreement by the attachment plaintiff with other creditors subsequently attaching the same property to prorate the proceeds thereof, which they could enforce under the statute if their liens were valid, did not constitute an abandonment of his lien on certain of the property, on which the latter attachments were held invalid in an action to which he was not a party.[51] Where the mortgagee of personal property of defendant is summoned as trustee of the mortgagor, and he appears and disclaims all interest as mortgagee, showing that there is no mortgage and no debt, his discharge by plaintiff will not dissolve the attachment.[52] An attachment lien is not waived by proceeding to judgment and execution sale of the attached goods pending appeal, with supersedeas, from an order dissolving the attachment.[53] An attachment levied against partnership property, in an action against one of the partners, is not deemed to be abandoned by the subsequent appointment, at the instance of plaintiff, of a receiver for the partnership.[54]

c. Effect of Abandonment

An abandonment of an attachment leaves the attachment lien as an absolute nullity.

Where an attachment has been voluntarily abandoned, all effects of the lien are gone as completely as though the attachment had never been levied.[55] An attachment on a part of the property may be released, in the absence of fraud and collusion, without prejudice to the attachment on that part of the property not released,[56] and a release by a prior attaching creditor of a part of the goods attached will not cause a postponement of his lien on the balance to that of subsequent attaching creditors.[57]

§ 263. —— By Act of Debtor

The lien of attachment cannot be destroyed by an intermediate act of the debtor himself.

The lien of attachment cannot be destroyed or taken away by an intermediate act of the debtor himself[58] Accordingly, it is held that a debtor cannot defeat the lien by claiming a homestead accruing subsequently to an attachment by reason of his marriage, or because of his residence on the attached land,[59] mortgaging the attached land[60] or personal property which has been released on a receipt,[61] selling the property,[62] even though the sale is for valuable consideration,[63] disclaiming an absolute devise to him of the land attached,[64] or voluntarily surrendering a leasehold interest attached.[65]

General assignment for the benefit of creditors will not, in the absence of a statute giving it such effect, defeat a lien of a previous attachment,[66] but some of the statutes provide that an assignment shall have this effect.[67]

§ 264. —— By Act or Omission of Levying Officer

Where an attaching officer does not keep possession or control of personal property seized, the attachment lien is lost, unless an agreement to prevent the discharge is had beforehand

An attaching officer has no power to release an attachment of realty.[68]

If a lien is created by a writ of attachment, such lien is lost when returned by the sheriff without a levy.[69]

Levy on personalty Even though the levying officer has no right to release an attachment of personalty[70] unless by the authority or consent of attachment plaintiff,[71] he has the power to do so.[72] In the absence of special statutory provisions, if the attaching officer fails to keep possession or control of personal property seized, the attachment is regarded as abandoned and the lien is lost,[73] except as against attachment defendant,[74] unless the

Rule in Maryland
Where chattels were seized by an officer under an attachment and the officer did not remove them from the premises but left them in the possession of the owner, it was held that if it should appear that the levy was not made in good faith, or for the purpose of its enforcement, as if the plaintiff's object was merely to obtain some security or to prevent some other levy being made in advance of his own, or to hinder or delay other creditors of the debtor, then the levy under the writ of attachment must be adjudged fraudulent and void However, it was apparent from the record in that case that no abuse of the writ was intended, and hence there was no constructive abandonment of the levy—First Nat Bank v. Corporation Commission of North Carolina, 157 A 748, 161 Md 508, 86 A L R 1407.
Physical possession necessary
The evidence must be sufficient to show that the attaching officer retained physical possession of the property attached—Bass v Dumas, 95 A 286, 114 Me 50 officer or his agent was deprived of possession by the wrongful act of another person, as will be discussed in § 265.

In order to maintain the lien, the continuous presence of an attaching officer, by himself or agent, with the property attached, is not necessary. It is sufficient if he exercise due diligence to prevent the property from going out of his control[75] A failure by an attaching officer to sign and file a return of attachment dissolves the attachment,[76] and, where an officer made numerous separate attachments on the same property, the fact that he made a sufficient return on one of the writs did not preserve the attachment as to the others[77] Where the attaching officer, or any person to whom he may deliver the goods for safe-keeping, permits them to return to the possession of the debtor, the attachment is, with respect to other creditors, ipso facto, dissolved;[78] but it has been held that, where an officer allowed the attached property to remain in the debtor's possession under an agreement between himself and the debtor that the attachment should still subsist, the attachment was not dissolved as against the debtor or anyone having notice of these facts.[79] Provided the debtor's use of the property will not result in injury to the property,[80] the fact that property attached is left in the hands of the debtor does not dissolve the attachment,[81] and attached property left in the hands of the debtor's wife is within the rule.[82] It has been held that in such a case there should be a keeper immediately representing the attaching officer who should be in possession and control of the property, and that the use thereof should be under the immediate supervision of such keeper[83] Where an agreement exists between the creditor and debtor that the property attached should continue to be delivered to a third party for use, the levying officer is not bound to either plaintiff or defendant and cannot require the third person to account, even though notice of seizure was served on it[84] If an officer mixes goods attached by him with other goods of the same kind attached by another officer, on a writ against the same defendant, so that the former goods cannot be identified, the lien of the last attachment is lost.[85] The act of an officer in merely permitting attached property to be sold and the proceeds substituted in lieu thereof did not constitute a release of the attachment.[86]

§ 265. —— By Act of Third Person

An attachment lien will not be released by a third person's acts.

An attachment lien will not be released or discharged because of the act of a third person.[87] Where an attaching officer or his agent is deprived of possession by the wrongful act of another person, the attachment is not regarded as abandoned, nor is the lien lost.[88]

§ 266. —— By Death

a. Of attaching creditor
b. Of attachment debtor

a. Of Attaching Creditor

Generally, the death of the plaintiff pending proceedings will not abate the attachment process.

Tenn.—Boyd v. Roberts, 10 Heisk. 474.

90. In re Vargas, 19 Wend (N.Y.) 154.

b. Of Attachment Debtor

In the absence of a controlling statute, the attachment lien may continue after the death of the attachment debtor unless the principal action is abated by reason thereof.

Provisions are made in some statutes that attachments levied prior to the death of defendant shall not affect the disposition of his estate.[91] Where the statute so provides, the death of defendant before judgment dissolves the attachment,[92] but, in the absence of regulating statutes, there appears to be no reason why the attachment lien should not continue in operation after the death of defendant,[93] unless the principal action abates by reason thereof.[94] Definite statutory provisions in some jurisdictions stipulate that the attachment lien shall survive defendant's decease.[95]

Solvency as governing consideration. In some jurisdictions the rule is that the attachment remains in force if defendant is solvent at the time of his death, but that where he dies insolvent the attachment is dissolved.[96]

Death after final judgment. The death of the attachment defendant after final judgment against him does not have the effect of defeating the lien,[97] even though he may be insolvent at the time of his death.[98]

§ 267. —— By Judicial Proceedings Generally

Generally, an attachment lien cannot be destroyed by judicial proceedings to which the creditor is not a party, except where bankruptcy or insolvency adjudications are involved.

The destruction of an attachment lien cannot be had by judicial proceedings to which the creditor is not a party,[99] except an adjudication of bankruptcy, or, under the statutes in some jurisdictions, insolvency of the attachment debtor.

The appointment of a receiver to take charge of corporate assets does not, in the absence of a statute so providing, destroy the lien of an attachment previously levied on property of the corporation,[1] even though the attached property comes into the possession of the receiver.[2]

§ 268. —— By Proceedings in Main Action

a. In general
b. Discontinuance, dismissal, or nonsuit
c. Judgment for plaintiff
d. Judgment for defendant
e. Failure to issue, levy, or enforce execution
f. Appeal and supersedeas

a. In General

An attachment may be dissolved and the attachment lien lost by the effect of proceedings in the main action.

Service of summons on a nonresident in the county in which the same is issued does not abate an attachment, nor furnish grounds for demurrer to a bill in equity founded on the fact of such nonresidence,[3] nor is an attachment dissolved by the appearance of defendant in the action,[4] although, as

Order for sale

Where a judgment, in actions consolidated for trial, foreclosed liens and ordered defendant's property sold, but a claim of a prior attachment lien was postponed for separate trial, and sufficient money was retained to pay the excepted claim if it should be established, it was held that sale of the property did not terminate the liens which were preserved, and the distribution of money preserved was merely postponed—Hendricks v Wall, (Tex Civ App) 277 S W. 207.

will be seen in § 408, formerly a different view may have been maintained. An amendment of the pleadings in the main action will not destroy an attachment,[5] at least where the object of the amendment is to cure a mere defect in form[6] or to make a more perfect statement of the original cause of action;[7] but it is otherwise as to an amendment which introduces a new demand or cause of action,[8] although in the absence of fraud this has been held to be untrue;[9] and it has also been held that an attachment is vacated by an amendment by which a corporation is substituted as plaintiff in place of the individual incorporators.[10] Where a new cause of action is pursued, including the cause on which an attachment was made, the attachment is not invalidated even though the new cause of action contained additional debt claims.[11] Where a complaint, when filed, contains sufficient averments to give the court jurisdiction, and an attachment of defendant's property is rightfully issued thereon, the fact that plaintiffs demurred to the answer, thereby admitting allegations of defense, is no ground for dissolving the attachment.[12] The lien of an attachment is not destroyed by the execution thereon.[13] It has been held that an attachment will be considered relinquished following the conversion of an action at law in which an attachment has been issued into a suit in equity,[14] but other holdings claim no general rule of law to be existent which requires a relinquishment of the attachment lien on such a transfer of the cause.[15]

Writ of error from the supreme court of the United States to reverse a judgment of a state court before execution ipso facto dissolves an attachment made at the commencement of the suit, because such a writ of error cannot be taken without giving security, which replaces the security of the attachment.[16]

Execution sale. Under a statute so providing, where the officer fails to complete the execution sale within five months after final judgment, the lien is lost and the execution purchaser takes subject to intervening rights.[17]

b. Discontinuance, Dismissal, or Nonsuit

A discontinuance, dismissal, or nonsuit in the main action will serve to dissolve the attachment and discharge the attachment lien.

Where the creditor in an attachment suit in which a levy has been made, and whose claim was sufficient to cover all the attached property, discontinued his suit on an agreement with the debtor to take all the property in satisfaction of his claim, it was held that, while his title might be good against the debtor, it would not be good against subsequent attaching creditors who perfected their lien by judgment and execution.[18] A discontinuance against a garnishee does not dissolve an attachment levied on land which the garnishee is alleged to have purchased by fraud.[19] An abatement of the main suit discharges the attachment.[20]

Dismissal of the original action in which an attachment was levied operates to release the attachment lien,[21] unless it is vacated and the action reinstated.[22]

Nonsuit of plaintiff will also serve to dissolve the attachment,[23] although where a nonsuit is set aside at the same term in which it is granted, the attachment lien is not destroyed.[24]

24. Conn—Hubbell v. Kingman, 52 Conn. 17.

c. Judgment for Plaintiff

A judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an attachment suit does not destroy the attachment.

The rendition of a judgment in favor of plaintiff in the attachment suit does not, as a rule, destroy the attachment,[26] even though the judgment was obtained without any contest on the part of defendant,[27] but it has been held that the lien is lost where the attaching creditor consents to a judgment in his own favor before the return day of the writ,[28] and that, if plaintiff knowingly and willfully takes a judgment in excess of what he may legally claim, it will dissolve the attachment as to subsequent attaching creditors.[29] The improper inclusion, in a judgment for attachment plaintiff, of claims not in existence at the time of the attachment may render the attachment lien void as against persons purchasing part of the property attached after the commencement of the attachment suit.[30]

Payment in full of plaintiff's judgment necessarily annuls the attachment,[31] but where an attaching creditor secures a judgment for part of his claim and appeals therefrom, defendant is not entitled to have the attachment vacated on paying the amount of the judgment.[32] Where a plaintiff has recovered judgment in an attachment suit, the mere deposit by defendant with the clerk of the amount of the judgment is not such a payment thereof as will entitle him to have the attached property released.[33] Where the claim in litigation is settled between the parties, no further inquiry will be made to determine whether an attachment was properly sued out, but it will be considered as discharged.[34] Where an attachment exists against certain property, and such property is conveyed by the owner as part payment of the decree issued against him in the main action, an extinguishment of the attachment on the property will result.[35]

Execution issued against the property attached supersedes the attachment lien, and, on its return unsatisfied, no lien exists which can be enforced by action.[36]

d. Judgment for Defendant

A judgment for defendant on the merits of the suit terminates the attachment and destroys the lien.

A judgment for defendant on the merits of the suit terminates the attachment,[37] even though the clerk fails to perform the ministerial duty of certifying the judgment to the register of deeds,[38] or fails to note the discharge of the attachment,[39] and a judgment for defendant on a plea in abatement has been held to have the same effect.[40]

39. Nichols v. Ingram, 146 P 988, 75 Or 439.

40. Ranscher v. McElhinney, 11 Mo. App. 434.

A reversal of the judgment for defendant revives the attachment.[41]

e. Failure to Issue, Levy, or Enforce Execution

Where it is so required, a failure to order execution will serve to release the attachment.

In some states a judgment for plaintiff in attachment is required to contain an order for special execution against, or sale of, the attached property, and a general judgment and execution releases the lien of the attachment;[42] but, in the absence of any express statutory requirement therefor, such an order, although customarily made, is not generally regarded as essential, and the lien of the attachment is not discharged by a general judgment and execution.[43] Where a judgment quasi in rem is rendered against attached property, directing it to be sold to satisfy the debt of the attaching creditor, the right which the latter has secured by the seizure under the writ of attachment becomes merged in the lien of the judgment.[44]

f. Appeal and Supersedeas

The pendency of an appeal by plaintiff may prevent dissolution of the attachment, but defendant's appeal bond may have that effect.

An appeal or writ of error sued out by defendant may release an attachment where defendant gives bond for the payment of the judgment, if it be affirmed.[45] The perfection of an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant within the required statutory time will have the effect of preventing the dissolution of the attachment, which would otherwise be caused by a judgment in favor of defendant.[46]

§ 269. —— By Legislative Enactment

An attachment lien cannot be annulled by a subsequent act of the legislature.

The repeal, during the pendency of a suit, of a statute providing for attachments, without any reservation or other saving clause, has been held to dissolve an attachment taken thereunder;[47] but the weight of authority supports the view that the lien or security acquired by attachment is of such force and value that it cannot be annulled by a subsequent act of the legislature.[48]

§ 270. —— Other Matters Effecting Release or Discharge

An attachment will not be set aside and its lien discharged by mere irregularities or defects in the proceedings.

Where irregularities occur in the proceedings prior to the issue of the attachment, the lien will not for that reason be defeated.[49] Further, a writ of attachment, even though it might be set aside because of the existence of defects or irregularities, is not invalidated, and if it be properly issued, in due form of law, and not an absolute nullity, it is a sufficient justification for the officer in holding the property, unless the lien created by the levy has been released or discharged in some manner.[50] In attachment cas-

49. Budd v. Long, 13 Fla. 288

50. Ela v. Shepard, 32 N H. 277.

Distinction between vacation and annulment
In New York, the court has drawn a distinction between the vacation and annulment of an attachment, saying "The entry of the order vacating the attachment did not annul the warrant of attachment. Such annulment occurs only in a case specified in section 3343, subdivision 12, of the Code of Civil Procedure." The provision referred to reads as follows: "A warrant of attachment against property is said to be 'annulled,' when the action, in which it

es the jurisdiction over any given subject matter is obtained by the levy thereon of a writ properly issued, and, no matter what, nor how great, errors or irregularities may subsequently occur, the res remains still in the grasp of the court, and its judgment in regard thereto will be valid and binding until reversed on error or appeal, or set aside in a direct and appropriate proceeding for that purpose.[51]

Change of jurisdictional boundaries. An attachment lien has been held not to be destroyed by the establishment of a new county line which places part of the attached property beyond the county where the writ was issued.[52]

Discharge of debtor on pauper's oath A discharge from commitment on execution by taking a poor debtor's oath will not of itself discharge the attachment made on the original writ, and thus release the receiptor of the property attached, on whom due demand was made.[53]

Expiration of attaching officer's term. An attachment does not abate on the expiration of the term of the officer by whom it was issued [54]

Substitution of security. Where a cash bond is substituted with the court's approval to stand in place of attached property, the attachment is not discharged.[55]

§ 271. Restoration of Lien

If an attachment lien is dissolved, terminated, or lost, it is ended and cannot be restored.

There is no way of reviving an attachment lien that is lost; a new attachment creating a new lien must be issued.[56] If the dissolution of an attachment is effected by the delivery of the property by the officer into the possession of the debtor, the attachment cannot be revived by a redelivery by the debtor to the officer;[57] and, even though the attaching officer does not, on dissolution of the lien, make a formal delivery of the property to the attached debtor, a second attachment will not, by virtue of such nondelivery, revive the lien created by the first attachment.[58] Where plaintiff attached defendant's land, and on his default entered judgment and took out execution, and at a subsequent term the execution was canceled, a new judgment rendered, and execution issued thereon, under which defendant's land was set off to plaintiff, his attachment lien having expired, his right to the land depended on his levy only, since the court's order vacating the former judgment did not revive the attachment.[59] An attachment of personalty dissolved by the officer taking the debtor's receipt was not restored by an order by the referee, in subsequent bankruptcy proceedings against the debtor, directing that the rights under the attachment be preserved for the benefit of the estate.[60] Where the first attachment of money is not made to enable the second to be made, and is abandoned simply because the right name of defendant is not given therein, and the second attachment is made on a writ issued to correct the mistake, and in all this the attachment plaintiffs and the officer serving the writs act without fraud and in good faith, the last attachment is valid, although the property is not returned to the owner before it is made.[61]

Act of the legislature cannot retrospectively restore an attachment which has been dissolved by the insolvency of the debtor.[62]

Where the attachment of realty had been properly made and the writ entered, a filing of the certificate of the clerk of court, stating that the clerk had found no record of entry of the action was held not to discharge the attachment, even had the writ not been entered, so as to invalidate the attachment as against subsequent purchasers relying on the record—Higgins v. a. General Rule

An attachment creditor is entitled under his lien only to the rights which the debtor had in the property at the time of the attachment, and is postponed to all prior liens or claims thereon except as special statutory provisions may affect such rights.

The rights of an attaching creditor with respect to the property attached must be determined by the state of the title at the time when the attachment was made.[63] Except in jurisdictions where he is so considered by force of statute,[64] he is not in the position of a bona fide purchaser for value,[65] but obtains only the rights which the debtor had in the property at that time, and is postponed to liens or claims of other persons upon or to the property, which became effective before the attachment,[66] except in so far as will be considered in §§ 274, 275, as he may avail himself of fraud in a transaction affecting the property, or, as will be seen in § 276, his position may be bettered by an omission on the part of others to comply with statutory requirements in respect to a transfer or encumbrance of the property. An attaching creditor may, however, succeed to the incidental rights to which the debtor was entitled by reason of his ownership of the property, as for example a right to redeem from a prior mortgage,[67] or a right to notice in regard to partition proceedings against the attached property,[68] or to the benefit of agreements in regard to such property,[69] but he is not entitled to rights and privileges in regard thereto which are personal to the debtor.[70]

All rights acquired in the attached property, from or against the attachment debtor, subsequent to the attachment, are subordinate thereto,[71] so that a title obtained under an attachment relates back to the time of the commencement of the lien, and the purchaser of the same acquires such title as the debtor had at that time, unaffected by any intermediate alienation or encumbrance.[72] So, where the attachment is lawful, title to the property obtained by a levy of an execution based upon the attachment is good as against encumbrances or notices of equities intervening between the attachment and the execution.[73]

Coowner of attached property

Where a deed of trust was given by a married man joined by his second wife to secure a promissory note, and a creditor of the married man subsequently acquired by attachment at foreclosure all the interest of the married man, and there was an heir of the first marriage whose rights in the property had not been settled, the attaching creditor and such heirs were not tenants in common nor the owners of equal rights to such an extent that the superior lien of the deed of trust covering the entire tract should be foreclosed as against each equally, but the interest of the attaching creditor is first to be sold, and thereafter that of the heir—Shear Co v. 73. Sanborn, McDuffee Co. v. Keefe, supra.

The lien of an attachment on property is superior to the claims of general creditors of the debtor.[74]

Claims of United States. The United States does not have, in the absence of statute, such a general right of priority or privilege over private creditors for the satisfaction of debts due to it as will entitle it to a prior satisfaction by attachment and levy over prior attaching creditors of its debtor,[75] but where priority is given by statute to claims of the United States such priority will take precedence over the claims of prior attaching private creditors.[76] Further, where the claim of the United States to preference is based upon a statute giving it preference in case of an attachment of the debtor's property as an absent or absconding debtor for the benefit of all his creditors, it acquires no right to priority where an attachment is taken out but is withdrawn by agreement among the creditors and the debtor;[77] and a surety upon the bond of a government contractor acquires no priority by sequestration to the rights of the federal government as against an attaching creditor where the attachment does not operate as a sequestration of the contractor's property for distribution among his creditors.[78]

What law governs. The question of the priority of the lien of a chattel mortgage executed in a foreign state upon property which at the time was therein situated as against the lien of an attachment levied on the property in another state must be determined by the law of the latter state, it being not only the law of the forum but also of the place where the property was situated at the time of the levy.[79]

(1) In General

The lien of an attachment on property subject to a valid outstanding charge or lien is inferior whether such lien is based on contract or arises by operation of law, but the attachment lien is superior to any subsequent lien or encumbrance subsequently created on the property attached.

The rule which has just been stated that an attaching creditor acquires only the rights which the debtor himself had in the attached property applies where the debtor holds title to the property subject to a valid outstanding charge or lien,[80] whether such lien is based upon a contract or agreement between the debtor and the lienor,[81] as in the case of a pledge,[82] or delivery of negotiable notes indorsed in blank to the debtor as agent of the payees for collection,[83] or assignment by a contractor of money due or to grow due from the owner to the contractor,[84] or the lien arising in favor of attorneys who purchased land for a client at execution sale under an agreement that they will hold the title in trust for the client, subject to the payment of fees and expenses in making the conveyance;[85] or whether it arises by operation of law,[86] as in the case of an attorney's lien upon money collected or recovered for

Money loaned to manufacturer
Money loaned for, and used in, the business of manufacturing becomes a lien on the plant on the filing of an attachment suspending the business of the plant, and takes priority to it, under some statutes—Goodnight v. Adsit, 11 Ky.Op. 157.

On the other hand the attachment takes priority over any lien or encumbrance on the property subsequently acquired or created,[95] even though it arises by virtue of a statute.[96] Where an attachment lien on realty is subject to an unrecorded charge thereon for the payment of a debt due by the owner of an equitable interest therein, the filing and recording of a notice of lis pendens in a suit for the debt prior to a sale of the property under the attachment proceedings is constructive notice to the purchaser at such sale of the prior equitable interest and his title is subject thereto.[97]

(2) Judgments

Whether the lien of a judgment is prior or subsequent to an attachment lien on the same property depends upon whether it attached prior or subsequent to the attachment.

Where a judgment has become a lien on property of defendant, before the levy of an attachment on the same property, the judgment creditor will prevail over the attaching creditor,[98] but where an attachment is levied before a judgment in favor of another person against the judgment debtor becomes a lien, the attaching creditor will ordinarily prevail without regard to the time when judgment is obtained in the attachment suit.[99] An attachment creditor of a corporation has a prior lien on the realty of the corporation as against a judgment creditor of a stockholder of the corporation who obtained his judgment prior to the levy of execution.[1] A judgment creditor who attached the personalty of his debtor is entitled to priority over a judgment creditor who did not attach such property.[2]

99. In re Stevenson's Estate, 289 P. 566, 87 Mont. 486—6 C J. p 291 note 54.

(3) Executions

An execution takes precedence over or is subsequent to the lien of an attachment according as the execution became effective prior or subsequent to the time of the attachment.

The levy of an execution upon personal property creates a lien superior to the lien of a subsequent attachment,[3] while on the other hand the lien of an attachment is superior to that of an execution which does not come to the hands of the officer until after a levy has been made under the attachment,[4] or in some jurisdictions until after the attachment writ has been delivered to the sheriff.[5] Where it is necessary that an execution be levied in order that it may constitute a lien upon defendant's property, an attachment which becomes a lien thereon at any time before the levy of the execution, although after it is issued, must be given priority,[6] but where an execution becomes a lien upon and binds the goods of defendant from the time it comes to the hands of the sheriff, it will prevail over an attachment levied after that time.[7]

The lien of an attachment of the proceeds of a sheriff's sale is subordinate to a claim under a deed relating back to the date of the sale.[8] It has been held that the lien of an execution levied on the debtor's realty subject to the lien debts of third parties who in the enforcement of a mortgage lien procured the issuance of a void attachment which was served on tenants owing rent on the debtor's realty is inferior to the lien of an attachment order against the same tenants owing rent.[9]

A sheriff's return on a fieri facias that the levy thereon was made subject to a former seizure of the same property under an attachment writ has been held conclusive on the execution creditor.[10]

The time at which an execution becomes a lien will be considered in the title Executions § 124 [23 C.J. p 490 note 52-page 493 note 73].

(4) Garnishment

Attachment and garnishment liens take precedence according to their priority in time.

The lien acquired by garnishment process is superior to that obtained by a subsequent attachment of the same property,[11] but is inferior to the lien obtained by a prior attachment thereof.[12]

(5) Mechanic's Lien

Ordinarily a mechanic's lien is prior or subsequent to an attachment lien according as to whether the mechanic's lien accrued prior or subsequent to the attachment.

An attachment is prior to a mechanic's lien subsequently accruing,[13] but an attachment subsequent to the accrual of a mechanic's lien is postponed thereto,[14] even though the lien is not perfected until after the attachment.[15] However, under some statutes laborers and materialmen serving stop notices as to a fund retained by the owner until a specified period after completion of the building are entitled to priority over an attachment of a prior date, preference, as between the laborers and materialmen, being given to the labor claims.[16] Where the priority in point of time of liens on a fund is first a mechanic's lien, then an attachment, followed by other mechanics' liens, the first mechanic's lien will not be shifted to money subsequently becoming due, in order to help the attaching creditor, where, to do so, would practically cut off the subsequent mechanics' liens.[17] A lien on money due from the owner to the contractor acquired by a person who has furnished work and materials to a subcontractor, although subsequent in point of time, is superior to an attachment, by a creditor of the subcontractor, of the amount owing from the contractor to the subcontractor.[18]

(6) Mortgages

Subject to the effect of recording acts, the charge of a mortgage and the lien of an attachment have priority according to the time of their creation.

Subject to the effect, as will be hereafter considered in § 276, of statutory requirements for the recording of mortgages, the charge of a prior mortgage on the property attached will prevail over the lien of a subsequent attachment,[19] provided the mort-

Advances after attachment

Rights of creditors establishing liens subsequent to recording of mortgage are subject to those of the mortgagee as to advances made before and after attachment if the latter were required by binding obligation on the part of the mortgagee—Barry v General Mortgage & Loan Corporation, 150 N E 293, 254 Mass 232.

Equitable mortgage

(1) Equitable mortgages generally prevail over liens of subsequent attachments.—Reidy v Collins, 26 P (2d) 712, 134 Cal App 713—Motor Acceptance Co v Finn, 13 P (2d) 761, 124 Cal App 766—Osha v Higgins, 96 A 700, 90 Vt 130

(2) A trust deed which was given to secure indebtedness owing to a beneficiary created an equitable lien or mortgage as between the parties thereto, whether or not the trust deed was effective as a trust deed, and took precedence over a subsequent attachment by the settlor's creditor—Burns v. Peters, (Cal) 55 P.(2d) 1182.

Unrecorded mortgage

(1) The lien of an attachment is subject to a prior unrecorded mortgage—Bain v Ullerich, 177 N W 61, 189 Iowa 149—Karger v Steele Wedeles Co, 79 N W. 216, 103 Wis 286.

(2) The lien of a mortgage executed before, but not recorded until after, the levying of an attachment is the prior lien, although the attaching creditor had no notice of the mortgage—Northwestern Forwarding Co v. Mahaffey, 12 P. 705, 36 Kan 152.

Corporate property

(1) Mortgage liens have priority over attachments which are levied upon corporate property after the execution of the mortgage—Hatch v. Johnson L & T. Co., (C C Kan) 79 F 828.

(2) It is immaterial that the mortgage is given to secure an increased bonded indebtedness where the attachment is levied after the increase and after the execution of the mortgage—Ruesterer v. Horton Land, etc, Co, 61 S W. 238. 160 Mo. 141.

Fraudulent transaction involving valid mortgage

Where a second mortgage given before attachment was not a part of a scheme involving assignments of a second mortgage designed to defraud creditors or defeat subsequent attachment, the attachment is subject

gage is a valid instrument,[20] and the mortgagee has not so conducted himself as to be estopped to assert his priority,[21] as where the attachment creditor was induced to extend credit to the mortgagor by the fraudulent representation of the mortgagee,[22] and the rule applies in a case involving chattels, even though the attachment is for the purchase price of the goods so mortgaged and attached,[23] especially where the mortgagee has taken possession before the levy.[24]

On the other hand, a mortgage executed after an attachment is levied on the property is subject thereto.[25] However, where a mortgage subsequently issued is to secure an issue of bonds to take up an earlier bond issue secured by a mortgage executed before the levy of the attachment, and the second mortgage expressly preserves the lien of the first for the benefit of the holders of bonds so exchanged, the holders of the exchanged bonds, who have no notice of the intermediate attachments, will be entitled to the security of the first mortgage and to priority over the subsequent attachment creditors,[26] but where a new mortgage is made to secure a loan made to pay off an old mortgage on property on which an attachment was levied subsequent to the execution of the first mortgage, in the absence of an agreement for conventional subrogation, the lien of the attachment is superior to that of the new mortgage.[27] Inasmuch as the date of the mortgage determines the rights of bondholders secured thereby even though the entire transaction of advancing money to the corporation and taking bonds as security therefor takes place at a later time, where attachments are levied upon corporate property after the execution of the mortgage but before the money is advanced to the corporation and bonds issued therefor, bondholders claiming under the mortgage are entitled to priority over the attaching creditors.[28] Also a trust deed mortgage securing an issue of negotiable bonds is superior, to the extent of all bonds issued for value, as by purchase or pledge, to attachment liens arising after the effective date of the trust deed, although such attachment liens may have arisen prior to the sale or pledge of some of the bonds.[29] The rights of a mortgagee who fails to accept the mortgage until after writs of attachment are levied on chattels will be held inferior and subject to the attachment liens.[30] Where an attachment is levied on property subject to a mortgage, the failure of the attaching creditor to make a deposit to secure such mortgage as required by statute will not postpone the attachment to a subsequent mortgage.[31]

A statute providing that the lien of an attachment on the equity of redemption of real estate will, where such real estate is thereafter redeemed, cover the

to the mortgage—Sandler v. Silk, (Mass.) 169 N.E. 431.

Equity of redemption

Improper conduct

Where property mortgaged in Kansas and brought to Oklahoma was seized under attachment, the mortgagee, who by replevin obtains possession and removes the property outside the state without foreclosure, as the Oklahoma statute requires, is guilty of conversion, and the attachment plaintiff is entitled to a return of the property or a satisfaction of his judgment.—Haltom v. Entrance in encumbrance book sufficient levy

A mortgage executed after the sheriff noted levy of attachment in encumbrance book, pursuant to Code (1897) § 3899, but before the sheriff entered a return upon the writ, is subject to the lien created by the sheriff's levy—First Nat. Bank v. Kindwall, 206 N.W. 241, 201 Iowa 82.

Prior trust deed securing subsequent loan

An attachment creditor's lien is superior to lien of prior unrecorded trust deed delivered after levy of attachment and securing money borrowed after attachment issued and applied to obtain releases of prior trust deeds—Platte v. Securities Inv. Co., (Tex.Com.App.) 55 S.W.(2d) 551, affirming (Civ.App.) 34 S.W.(2d) 295.

Corporate property

Attachments levied on corporate property before the execution of a mortgage are entitled to priority over the mortgage lien—Griffin v. International Trust Co., (Alaska) 161 F. 48, 88 C.C.A. 212.

Erroneous entry of judgment

Title resting upon attachment antedating mortgage is good as against assignee of mortgage, although entry of "neither party" was erroneously made in attachment suit and later stricken—Sawyer v. Calais Nat. Bank, 138 A. 470, 126 Me. 314.

premises discharged of the mortgage, does not apply to a discharge of a mortgage by mutual mistake of the parties.[32]

Attachment of rents. A creditor who attaches rents due on realty before the commencement proceedings to foreclose a mortgage of such realty acquires a lien on such rents superior to the lien of the mortgage.[33] So the claim of the attaching creditor is superior as to rents under a lease executed by the mortgagor after execution of the mortgage when the attachment is levied before the mortgagee has asserted his right to claim the rents.[34]

An attachment levied on crops by a landlord as an aid to the enforcement of his lien for rent, relates back, as enforcing the landlord's lien to the time when such lien accrued, so that where the landlord's lien is a charge upon the crop for the payment of the rent and accrues as soon as there is any crop upon which it may attach, such attachment is prior to a mortgage executed subsequently to the execution of the lease and before the attachment was levied.[35]

Abandoned attachment lien. An inchoate lien obtained by attachment not followed up and perfected by a judgment or decree in that action, but abandoned, is of no validity as against a subsequent mortgage.[36]

(7) Receiverships

The lien of an attachment is prior, as against a receiver subsequently appointed, to the extent of the property attached.

As has been heretofore stated (see supra § 267), the appointment of a receiver does not, in the absence of statute so providing, divest liens acquired by attachment, but a creditor attaching the debtor's property before the appointment of a receiver acquires a lien thereon, which when perfected by final judgment, entitles him to a preference over other less diligent creditors.[37] However, the fact that before the appointment of a receiver, one levies an attachment on certain property or funds does not give him a preference enforceable generally against the receiver,[38] but only a preference to the extent of the property or funds attached,[39] and an application therefore to have the judgment paid by the receiver should, in the absence of any showing that such funds were themselves sufficient for the purpose, be denied.[40]

Receivers' certificates of a private corporation are ordinarily inferior to the lien of a prior attachment.[41]

(8) Wages

An employee's lien for wages earned has priority over an attachment lien.

An employee's statutory lien for wages ordinarily is by the statute creating it given priority over an attachment,[42] even though levied prior to the commencement of the employee's suit.[43] However, under some statutes, the priority in such case is limited to the value of the work and labor performed prior to the levy of the attachment.[44]

A seaman's lien for wages on freight and cargo has been held superior to the title of attaching creditors.[45]

(9) Widow's Allowance

Ordinarily the widow's allowance is prior to a lien by attachment.

The widow's allowance usually takes precedence of

Mistake as to title

Where land that had been attached was sold without knowledge of the attachment, and the purchaser discharged a mortgage thereon because of mistake of fact as to title, the attaching creditor could not thereafter levy on the attached premises and hold the proceeds of a forced sale as against the purchaser, to a greater extent than the value of the equity of redemption—Williams v. Libby, 105 A. 855, 118 Me. 80.

Valid excuse for mistake

Where real property was attached, but no service was made on the owner, who subsequently sold the property to a third person without knowledge of the attachment, such third person was not guilty of laches in failing to examine the records, it appearing that he was in poor physical and mental health—Williams v. all liens by attachment.[46] This has been held to be true even with respect to property upon which a levy has been made,[47] but there is authority which holds that the attachment is entitled to priority with respect to property levied on.[48]

§ 273. —— Sale, Conveyances, and Assignments

Subject to the effect of registration statutes, a sale, conveyance, assignment, or other transfer is superior or inferior to the lien of an attachment according as to which was first executed or levied.

Since, as has been stated in § 71, only the interest of the attachment debtor is subject to attachment, and, as has been noted in § 272, the attaching creditor reaches only the interest which the debtor had at the time, it follows that a sale, conveyance, assignment, or other transfer by the debtor before the levy of the attachment takes priority over it,[49] although the assignment or other transfer be equitable,[50] if the transfer or assignment be in fact valid and operative.[51] On the other hand, the attachment takes priority over any subsequent sale, conveyance, or transfer by the debtor,[52] if the at-

Abandonment

Where a debtor who was purchasing realty under an installment contract abandoned it before his creditor attached, his creditor obtained no lien thereby —W. F Miller Co. v. Grussi, 98 A 90, 90 Conn. 555.

Partial assignment

(1) Debtor's partial assignment before laying of attachment has priority —Pen Mar Co. v. Ashman, 136 A. 640, 152 Md 273

(2) Although assignments were partial and not accepted, yet, in equity, the attaching creditors obtained priority over the assignee only to part of the fund not assigned —Davis v. Claxton, 268 P. 787, 82 Mont. 574.

(3) However, in jurisdictions where partial assignments without the consent of the debtor are declared void (see Assignments §§ 38–40), subsequent attaching creditors obtain priority over such assignees —Kiddoo v Ames, 73 Mo App 667—Missouri Pac R. Co. v. Wright, 38 Mo.App 141.

Right to question validity

Abandonment

Where attachment precedes abandonment of realty by a debtor who was purchasing under installment contract, the creditor's rights, acquired under its attachment, can not be disposed of by the abandonment. —W. F. Miller Co v. Grussi, 98 A. 90, 90 Conn 555.

Deed to be delivered on compliance with terms

(1) Property conveyed by deed mailed to bank with directions to deliver it on payment of the purchase price is subject to the lien of an attachment delivered to the sheriff, after filing of lis pendens notice, before the bank's receipt and delivery of the deed.—Parker v. Curll, 126 N. E 858, 73 Ind App. 178.

(2) Where deed was not in escrow but was merely held by bank to be delivered on compliance with the vendor's terms, the lien of attachment writ duly levied and recorded before the deed was delivered by the bank is superior to any right acquired by the grantee —Covert v. Calvert, (Tex Civ.App) 287 S W. 117.

Right to contest validity

A subsequent lien claimant cannot take advantage of mere irregularities in a levy of an attachment not objected to by defendant and founded upon a bona fide claim, except where the attachment lien itself is assailed for actual fraud in its creation —Title Ins. & Trust Co v California Development Co, 152 P. 542, 171 Cal. 173

Transfer subject to attachment

(1) Grantee, who agreed in deed

tachment is valid[53] and has not been abandoned[54] the debtor, however, retaining, until a sale on execution, full power to dispose of the property attached subject to the attachment.[55]

Lien of unpaid seller. Unless the seller agrees that the purchaser may encumber the property,[56] or statutory provisions prevent, the lien of an unpaid seller of personalty,[57] or the implied lien of a vendor of realty[58] is superior to the lien of an attaching creditor of the purchaser; as is also the reserved lien of a vendor of realty, although an assignment of the lien was unrecorded and it had been erroneously released of record.[59] Moreover the right of a third person who advanced the purchase money for the purchase of personalty with the agreement that he should hold the title thereto until he was repaid,[60] and the lien of a third person advancing the purchase money for the purchase of realty,[61] is superior to that of an attachment creditor of the purchaser. The holder of a vendor's lien does not subordinate it to the lien of a subsequent attachment by subsequently to the levy of attachment taking a conveyance of the land.[62] Where, after an attachment has been levied on his interest, the vendee surrenders possession to the vendor on being released from the payment of the purchase money notes, the attaching creditor is seized of no greater estate than was owned by the vendee and by his purchase under the attachment with full notice of the vendor's rights acquires only the right to redeem against the vendor's lien on paying the agreed price.[63] A sale by a trustee under a deed of trust securing the purchase money will not be invalidated by an attachment made just before the sale and without any notice to the trustee.[64]

Conditional sale of personalty. Except as the rule is changed by statutes requiring contracts of conditional sale of personalty to be recorded (see infra § 276), an attaching creditor of a conditional vendee of personalty will be postponed to the rights of the vendor of the personalty attached,[65] although there is some contrary authority,[66] and after complete rescission of such a sale an attachment against the vendee is not effective against the vendor.[67] If at the time the attachment is made the conditional vendor has the right to retake the property because of a default by the vendee in the terms of the contract, the rights of the attaching creditor are subservient thereto,[68] but where the conditional vendee is not in default, a creditor of the vendee by attachment acquires a lien superior to the vendor's right to retake the property and which entitles him to succeed to the rights of the vendee in the property, subordinate, of course, to the vendor's claim.[69]

Contract to convey. It has been held that the levy of an attachment on land subsequently to the execution of a contract to convey the same cannot defeat a bill for specific performance by the vendee,[70] but a deed executed pursuant to a verbal contract of sale under which the purchaser had not taken possession does not relate back to the verbal contract so as to defeat a lien created by an intermediate attachment.[71]

An unrecorded conveyance of real estate will prevail over a subsequent attachment thereof under process directed against the vendor,[72] unless, as will be seen in § 276, a different rule is established by a statute in reference to the recording of such instruments. However, this applies only to claims under the attachment as such, and the conveyance must, in order to protect the vendee, be recorded before the property is sold under execution on the judgment in the attachment suit,[73] failing in which a bona fide purchaser at the execution sale will acquire good title to the property,[74] provided his deed is recorded before the former deed.[75]

§ 274. —— Property Fraudulently Obtained by Debtor

The lien of an attaching creditor of a fraudulent grantee is subject to the rights of the defrauded grantor and those holding under him.

Where property has been purchased on fraudulent representations, a creditor of the purchaser attaching it acquires only the rights which the purchaser himself has, and the defrauded vendor can enforce his right to have the sale set aside against the attaching creditor as well as against the fraudulent vendee.[76] So also creditors of a grantee who attached real property conveyed to him in fraud of the grantor's creditors have been held to obtain no right in the same against subsequent mortgagees of the grantor to whom the property had been reconveyed.[77]

§ 275. —— Property Fraudulently Conveyed by Debtor

A fraudulent transfer or encumbrance of property will not defeat or postpone the lien of a subsequent attachment.

Where a debtor has sold, conveyed, transferred, or encumbered his property with a fraudulent intent, which the transferee or party to whom the encumbrance is given, shared or has been cognizant of, the transaction cannot defeat or postpone the lien of a subsequent attachment.[78] Accordingly, it is generally held that where a sale of personalty is not followed by a change of possession the lien of an attachment is superior to the claim of the vendee.[79]

a. In respect of personal property
b. In respect of real property

a. In Respect of Personal Property

(1) In general
(2) Effect of notice

(1) In General

The lien of a subsequent attachment takes precedence over an unrecorded chattel mortgage or conditional sale of personalty where the validity of the latter as against third persons depends on their registration.

Where the statutes require that mortgages or conditional sales of personalty must be recorded in order to be valid against creditors and purchasers for value, an attaching creditor may, in default of such record, acquire a greater right in the property covered by such an instrument than his debtor had and become entitled to priority over claims based on such instrument.[80] This is true, where the recording statute makes no exception in such case, although the mortgagee has exercised reasonable care in securing the record of his mortgage.[81] Furthermore, if the statute requires immediate delivery of possession or immediate recording of the mortgage, a noncompliance therewith will postpone the mortgage to an attachment for a debt contracted prior to the recordation thereof, even though the instrument is finally recorded before the attachment issues;[82] and an attachment levy on personalty, left in the unrestricted possession of the attachment debtor, gives the attaching creditor no protection as against a subsequent innocent purchaser.[83] However, a statute declaring that the failure to record a conditional sales contract renders such sale absolute except as between the vendor and vendee cannot be invoked to aid an attachment by a creditor of a party other than the conditional vendee.[84]

Insufficient notice. Where the instrument though recorded is by reason of its insufficient description of the property not constructive notice the attachment lien is superior.[85]

(2) Effect of Notice

The authorities are not in accord on whether an attaching creditor's knowledge of a prior chattel mortgage on, or conditional sale of, the attached property will deprive him of his priority.

Actual notice on the part of the attaching creditor of an unrecorded mortgage or conditional sale of personalty has been held insufficient to deprive him of the priority to which he was entitled by reason of the failure to record the instrument,[86] but there is also authority for the contrary view,[87] and where a chattel mortgage was wrongly indexed, a subsequent attachment creditor with actual notice has been held bound thereby.[88]

In an action to determine priority of liens between a conditional sale vendor of personal property, under a contract reserving title in vendor until the property is paid for, and an attaching creditor who had actual notice of the vendor's reservation of title contract, prior to the levying of the attachment, the vendor is entitled to a first and prior lien on the property involved, and such lien may be established in an equitable proceeding—Security Nat Bank of Oklahoma City v. Truscon Steel Co., 218 P 665, 92 Okl 81.

88. Kern v. Wilson, 48 N W. 919, 82 Iowa 407.

(1) In General

Under the statutes in several jurisdictions an attaching creditor without notice of a prior unrecorded deed to, encumbrance on, or right in, the attached realty is entitled to priority; and a grantee or person holding an encumbrance or right in realty is likewise entitled to priority over an unrecorded attachment where their registration is required.

The phraseology of some statutes regarding the registration of titles to real estate places an attaching creditor on a par with a purchaser, and under such statutes a creditor levying his attachment without notice of a prior unrecorded deed is entitled to priority over the grantee under the unrecorded deed.[89] The same rule has been applied to an unrecorded lease,[90] mortgage,[91] outstanding equity,[92] partition,[93] or title bond.[94] On the other hand, the lien of a mortgage recorded prior to the time the attachment was made is superior to the lien of the attachment.[95] In some jurisdictions a deed recorded within a reasonable time after delivery prevails over the lien of an attachment made after the delivery of the deed, but prior to the recording of it,[96] and under some statutes if a deed[97] or mortgage,[98] executed before an attachment is made on the realty deeded or mortgaged, but not recorded until afterward, is recorded before judgment is obtained under the attachment, such deed or mortgage is good as against the attaching creditor or a purchaser at execution sale under the attachment. Also, it is held in some jurisdictions that instruments conveying equitable titles, although entitled to be recorded, need not be, in order to protect such title against attaching creditors.[99] An agreement con-

Notation for registration sufficient

The notation of a deed for registration as required by the Tennessee statute, in order to give such deed effect as against the creditors of the vendor from the date of such noting, is sufficient where the date of the receipt thereof is indicated in the register's note book by ditto marks referring to words and figures in the preceding line, so that where a deed, although noted for registration about sixteen months before an attachment was levied on the land as the property of the vendor, was not actually registered until eleven days after such levy, such notation was valid in the absence of proof that the deed was not in the register's office during the time from its notation until after it was registered.—Hughes v. Powers, 42 S W. 1, 99 Tenn. 480.

Reregistration

Where the registration of a deed is ineffectual because a judge of the court before whose clerk the acknowledgment was made did not certify to the official character of such clerk, as required by statute, a reregistration, with the omitted certificate, takes effect, as to the grantor's creditors, from the date the amended deed is noted for registration, and does not relate back to the noting and registration of the defective deed—Citizens' Bank v. McCarty, 42 S W. 4, 99 Tenn 469

In absence of recorded deed to debtor, the attaching creditor is not entitled to the benefits of the registration statute—Parks v West, (Tex Civ App) 274 S.W. 164—6 C.J. p 297 note 82 [n].

Defective deed

A purchaser of realty at a judicial sale under attachment proceedings, without notice of an unrecorded defective deed to the realty, executed prior to the attachment by the debtor, whose deed also was not of record, takes a good title as against the grantee of the debtor—Paine v. Mooreland, 15 Ohio 435, 45 Am D. 585.

Early rule

Under an early statute which required deeds to be recorded within a stated period from the time of their execution, an attachment made subsequent to the execution of a deed to the realty but prior to the time it was recorded has a preference over such deed where it was not recorded within the time prescribed by law—Parker v. stituting one an equitable mortgagee of land gives him a lien superior to that of a subsequent attaching creditor, although the mortgage is not made or recorded until after the attachment;[1] and where an equitable mortgage is not in legal form as a mortgage and so is not subject to the registration laws, it is not essential that it be recorded in order to have priority over a subsequent attachment.[2] An attachment against one whose title or interest in land is not of record is not preferred or benefited by the recording law,[3] so that if there is no deed on record to the debtor, the attaching creditor gets only such title as the debtor actually has in the property at the time of the levy.[4]

Notice or registration of attachment. The failure to file a lis pendens notice of attachment, when required, will render the lien of the attachment invalid as against a subsequent bona fide sale and transfer of the realty.[5] Under a statute which changes the rule, that the lien of an attachment in which the correct name of the defendant is not shown in the writ or on the records or index of the registry of deeds is good as against a purchaser of the realty attached for value in good faith and without notice[6] by providing that when the writ is seasonably amended to show the correct name of defendant, the attachment shall not be valid as against such bona fide purchasers except from the time a correspondingly amended copy is properly recorded, such statute applies only to cases where the owner of land sought to be attached is wrongly named in the writ, and the writ is afterward amended, and has no application where the writ is not amended to show the correct name of the owner of the realty.[7] Under the Torrens Law a properly registered attachment gives a lien superior to the rights of the holder of a prior unregistered conveyance of which the creditor had no actual notice.[8]

Provisional records; judicial mortgages. The recording of an attachment of realty made for securing the result of a suit does not change the character of the debt or give to the attaching creditor a preference over other existing creditors which he did not have before, the only preference obtained being limited to creditors whose claims are contracted subsequent to such recording.[9]

(2) Effect of Notice

Ordinarily knowledge or notice to an attaching creditor of a prior unrecorded deed or encumbrance will postpone his rights thereto.

Time notice dates from Under act of 1889 (Rev.St. art 6858), constructive notice of an attachment levy on land under the doctrine of lis pendens does not date from the time of the filing of a copy of the writ of attachment and the sheriff's return in the county clerk's office, but from the actual making of the required record by the clerk, so that under act of 1905 (Rev St arts 6837–6840), a bona fide purchaser for value, after the filing of such copies, but before the record is made, acquires rights superior to the attachment lien—City Nat. Bank of Corpus Christi v. Craig, 257 S W 210, 113 Tex 375, affirming (Civ.App) 233 S.W 631.

Land for which notice required

(1) By the act of 1889 (Rev St. art 6858), for an attachment to constitute a prior lien as against a subsequent bona fide sale or encumbrance of the realty, notice of the attachment must be placed of record in the office of the county clerk where the attachment was on land outside the county where the attachment suit was pending, but as to land within the country the doctrine of lis pendens made the attachment lien a prior lien—City Nat Bank of Corpus Christi v Craig, 257 S W 210, 113 Tex 375, affirming (Civ App) 233 S W. 631.

(2) By the act of 1905 the requirement as to recording notice of attachment liens was extended so that for an attachment to constitute a prior lien as against a subsequent bona fide sale or encumbrance of the realty notice of the attachment must be placed of record in the office of the county clerk whether the attachment is made on land within or without the county where the attachment suit is pending—City Nat Bank of Corpus Christi v. Craig, supra.

Recorded attachment a prior lien

A purchaser of property after the levy of an attachment thereon and the due recording of a copy of the attachment and the sheriff's return has constructive notice of the levy such that she is not a bona fide purchaser under Rev St arts 6837–6840, entitled to take advantage of a failure to file notice of lis pendens—Holford v. creditor's actual knowledge of a prior unrecorded deed at the time when his attachment is levied will postpone his rights to those of the grantee under the unrecorded deed,[11] and upon the same principle an outstanding unrecorded equity cannot be defeated by the attachment of a creditor who has notice of such equity.[12]

What constitutes sufficient notice. An attaching creditor is chargeable with notice in the same manner as a subsequent purchaser.[13] Open, notorious possession of land is notice,[14] and except where land is registered under Torrens Law,[15] an open and notorious possession of land by the grantee[16] or by a tenant[17] is constructive notice of his title It is not, however, notice of an unrecorded deed that a subsequent deed of the same premises by the grantee,[18] a subsequent mortgage,[19] or an unacknowledged deed[20] has been recorded, or that a declaration of trust is filed by a cestui que trust when such a declaration is not a recordable instrument.[21]

A showing of facts sufficient to put the attaching creditor on inquiry has been held sufficient to charge him with notice [22]

Notice before levy of execution. It has been held that, although an attachment of real estate is made without notice that the debtor has conveyed it to a bona fide purchaser, the lien of the attaching creditor is defeated by actual notice of such conveyance, received before he levies his execution thereon, or has lawfully applied it to the satisfaction of his debt;[23] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[24]

Agreement to create lien; equitable mortgage

Under a statute providing that no deed of trust or mortgage conveying a legal or equitable title to real or personal estate shall be valid against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice thereof, or against creditors, until such deed shall be acknowledged or proved according to law, and lodged for record, an attaching creditor with notice has a lien superior to that reserved in a note given by the purchaser to a third party who advanced money for the purchase price of land—Schmidt v Carter's Adm'r, 28 S W 364, 95 Ky 1, 15 Ky L 402 sued in actions to enforce specific liens on the property regardless of which was prior in time,[25] or which give precedence to the attachment first recorded,[26] the general rule is that as between successive attachments of the same property the one which is earlier in point of time is entitled to priority,[27] irrespective of the time when judgments are recovered in the attachment suits,[28] and without regard to which of the two suits was first instituted,[29] but there is no priority where the first levy was made only on property other than that levied on under the subsequent writ.[30]

The rule is not affected by the circumstance that a subsequently attaching creditor shows superior diligence in getting a fraudulent conveyance of the property set aside,[31] or in defeating a previous fraudulent attachment;[32] that one of the attaching creditors is a nonresident[33] or had notice of a prior unrecorded attachment,[34] that entry of a personal judgment was erroneously made against a nonresident debtor on whom constructive service only was had;[35] that one of the attachments is under a statute specially giving a right to attach goods sold for unpaid purchase money;[36] that the attachment writs issued out of different courts and the property levied on was not the same,[37] that the earlier attachment was issued out of a court of limited jurisdiction;[38] that the property attached is a fund in the hands of the attaching creditor which belongs to the attachment debtor,[39] that the interest of the debtor was contingent at the time of the prior levy;[40] that the affidavit on which the first attachment was based was amended after the second attachment was levied;[41] or that the prior attaching creditor obtained his priority by the use of devices to delay or hinder the other creditor.[42] It has been held, however, that a creditor who has consented to a levy by another on a part of the lands he has attached may not afterward take the lands away, and, if he does, it is a fraud for which relief will be granted,[43] and in a case where several attachments issued on a ground not controverted, but the record showed no right to an attachment in any of the attaching creditors, a pro rata distribution was held proper.[44]

Where the property subject to more than one attachment is of sufficient value to pay all attachment liens on it, the question of priority does not arise.[45]

Ratification of prior unauthorized attachment. If the commencement of an action in which an attachment is issued was unauthorized, but is afterward ratified, the ratification cannot cut out or prejudice the rights of intervening attachments.[46]

Necessity for diligence and compliance with statute. In order to preserve his priority, the first attaching creditor is held to strict compliance with the law, and must take all the steps necessary to subject the attached property to sale under execution in satisfaction of his claim.[47] Accordingly, if the action in which the senior attachment was issued is not prosecuted to judgment, but is settled out of court, and the suit is continued, it will have the effect of postponing the lien of such attachment to the junior attachment lien.[48]

Failure to give bond. It has been held that, where the debtor was constructively summoned, the fact that the creditor did not give a bond for the restoration of the property attached in case the judgment should be set aside until after the judgment had been obtained, although the statute required it before judgment, did not deprive him of his priority of lien over a subsequent attaching creditor;[49] but under a statute providing that, when an attachment is issued against a nonresident debtor and plaintiff has given no bond, the attachment shall be dissolved on defendant's entering his appearance, etc., where such nonresident defendant answers and prays dissolution of the attachment for failure of plaintiff to give bond, his property is so far freed as to let in a subsequent creditor, whose attachment is levied before the first creditor perfects his attachment by giving bond.[50]

Dissolution of senior attachment. In the case of several successive attachments of the same property, if the first attachment is set aside or dissolved, the second attachment will then be the first in the order of priority [51]

An attachment of firm property for a firm debt, although subsequent in point of time, takes priority of an attachment of firm property for a personal debt of one of the firm.[52]

b. Whether Levy or Delivery of Writ Governing Consideration

The time of the levy or of the delivery of the writ to the levying officer determines priority in accordance with the applicable rule as to the time fixing the date of origin of the lien.

As an attachment usually becomes a lien only from the time when a levy is made thereunder (see supra § 255), the general rule is that the priority between different writs of attachment is fixed according to the relative time when the respective levies are made thereunder;[53] and in this connection, although there is some authority to the contrary,[54] as a general rule, it is proper to regard fractions of a day.[55] It has been held, however, that, as it is the duty of an officer in whose hands several writs are placed to levy them in the order in which he received them (see supra § 211), his disregard of his duty in this respect will not be permitted to deprive the creditor whose writ was first delivered of the priority which a proper performance of the officer's duty would have given him.[56] In jurisdictions where the lien of an attachment dates from the time of the delivery of the writ to the officer (see supra § 255), the lien of the attachment which is first placed in the hands of the officer is necessarily prior to that of one subsequently delivered to him, even though the latter is first served [57]

c. Postponement of Prior Attachment

(1) Power of court
(2) Right to attack prior attachment
(3) Grounds for postponement

(1) Power of Court

The courts have power to postpone the lien of one attachment to that of another in a proper case.

Under a statute allowing the court to settle questions of priority and good faith of attachments sufficient chancery power can be exercised to postpone one for another for any sound equitable reason.[58]

(2) Right to Attack Prior Attachment

A junior attaching creditor possessing a valid attachment on the property in issue is entitled to seek a postponement of the lien of a prior attachment to his own.

A junior attaching creditor is entitled,[59] in the discretion of the court,[60] to present objections to a prior attachment for the purpose of postponing it to his own; but in order to acquire any standing in court for this purpose he must show that his own attachment is valid[61] and that a binding levy was made thereunder on the same property that was seized under the prior writ.[62]

(3) Grounds for Postponement

(a) Jurisdictional defects generally
(b) Nonexistence of grounds of attachment
(c) Invalidity of claim
(d) Immaturity of claim
(e) Irregularities
(f) Alteration of writ
(g) Insolvency of defendant
(h) Consent to judgment
(i) Assignment of cause of action
(j) Fraud
(k) Directions to officer not to levy
(l) Change of venue

(a) Jurisdictional Defects Generally

The lien of a prior attachment may be postponed for jurisdictional defects in the attachment proceeding.

A prior attachment creditor may be postponed where his proceedings are tainted with a defect which takes away the jurisdiction of the court and renders the proceeding void,[63] as where the prior attachment was based on a claim for which the remedy by attachment was not available,[64] where the writ was issued contrary to statutory provisions, before the main action was commenced,[65] where the affidavit was fatally defective,[66] or where the attachment suit was brought without plaintiff's knowledge.[67] Omitting the name of defendant whose property is attached from an attachment bill has been held to be a defect which will postpone the lien of the attachment to that of another creditor whose levy was subsequently made,[68] and even a slight error in the name of defendant has been held sufficient to postpone a prior to a subsequent attachment.[69]

(b) Nonexistence of Grounds of Attachment

In the absence of fraud, nonexistence of the ground of attachment is not sufficient to postpone the attachment lien.

Nonexistence of the ground of attachment is not available to postpone a prior attachment,[70] except when such attachment is based on grounds known to be false.[71] The filing of an amended petition, which for the first time alleged that the creditor had a mortgage on the goods attached, a fact essential to the validity of a specific attachment, has been held not to relate back to the order of specific attachment issued when the original petition was filed, so as to affect the priority acquired in the meantime by other attaching creditors.[72]

(c) Invalidity of Claim

Invalidity of claim is a ground for postponement.

A subsequent attachment creditor may obtain priority over an earlier attachment by showing that the claim on which it was based is invalid,[73] even though the attachment defendant has consented to judgment thereon.[74]

(d) Immaturity of Claim

Immaturity of claim is a ground for postponement.

A junior attaching creditor may obtain preference by showing that the prior attachment was based on an immature claim.[75]

(e) Irregularities

Mere irregularities of which the debtor did not take advantage are not grounds for postponement.

An attachment will not be postponed to the claims of subsequent attaching creditors because of irregularities of which defendant in attachment has not taken advantage,[76] such as defects in the affidavit,[77] irregularities in the attachment bond,[78] in the summons[79] or the service thereof,[80] or a defective description in the return of the land levied on;[81] nor will the lien of an attachment be postponed because judgment was erroneously rendered for an amount in excess of that stated in the petition and affidavit where, with the consent of the debtor, a remittitur was entered of the excess.[82]

Where, however, plaintiff begins attachment proceedings against defendant under a wrong name and has to begin over again, his first action does not give him priority over those filing attachment proceedings after his first suit was begun.[83] If a writ of attachment securing a builder's lien is defective for failure to command the sheriff to attach the property, the attachment falls behind the attachment of other lienors, who have properly secured their liens, but is good against the debtor and any liens thereafter attaching.[84]

(f) Alteration of Writ

Alteration of the writ to the prejudice of subsequent attaching creditors is a ground for postponement.

It has been held that any alteration of a writ to the prejudice of the rights of subsequently attaching creditors will dissolve the attachment as against them.[85]

(g) Insolvency of Defendant

Insolvency of defendant is not a ground for postponement.

The notorious insolvency of defendant is not ground for postponing a prior attachment.[86]

(h) Consent to Judgment

Consent to judgment by the debtor is not a ground for postponement.

It is not ground for postponing a prior attachment that the debtor consented to judgment against him for a bona fide debt,[87] even though the creditor paid a money consideration for such consent.[88]

Prima facie cause of action sufficient

(i) Assignment of Cause of Action

Assignment of the cause of action is not a ground for postponement.

It is not sufficient ground for postponing a prior attachment that a colorable assignment of a just cause of action was made to enable the assignee to sue in a certain state.[89]

(j) Fraud

Fraud in the attachment is a ground for postponement

A subsequent attaching creditor may secure priority by showing that the earlier attachment was fraudulent.[90] However, the fact that a creditor, being in actual possession of goods of the debtor under a claim of title to them which was legally unfounded, placed them in the nominal possession of his attorney, in a place known only to himself, and was thus enabled to secure a levy on them prior in law to that of other attaching creditors, does not warrant a court of equity in postponing his lien to theirs.[91] A prior attachment which is only partly illegal will be wholly void as against subsequent legal attachments.[92]

(k) Directions to Officer Not to Levy

Directions by the creditor to the levying officer not to levy or to delay levying are grounds for postponement.

A creditor who directs the officer receiving the writ not to levy it,[93] or not to levy it unless another attachment issues,[94] may be postponed to a subsequent attaching creditor.

(l) Change of Venue

A change of venue in the attachment suit is not a ground for postponement.

A change of venue in an attachment suit will not postpone a prior attachment to a subsequent one.[95]

§ 278. Priorities between Simultaneous Attachments

The liens of simultaneous attachments have no priority, but are entitled to share equally.

Where there are several simultaneous attachments, that is, where the several writs are delivered to the officer, or the property is levied on at the same time, the rule is that there is no priority, but they are entitled to share equally.[96] If, however, the claim of some of the attachments is less than the portion of the proceeds which they are entitled to under this rule, the surplus will be bound by, and must be divided among, the remaining attachments.[97]

§ 279. Proceedings for Determination of Priorities

a. By petition or motion in first action

(1) Right to Proceed in This Manner

Subject to particular statutory provisions in force, a junior attaching creditor may attack a prior attachment by intervening in the original suit, or by motion to vacate the earlier attachment, or by appearing and defending against the prior attachment suit.

Although the details of the proceedings by which a junior attaching creditor may attack a previous attachment vary according to state statutes, the two modes in general use are for the second creditor to file a petition of intervention in the original suit,[98] or to move to vacate the earlier attachment.[99] It has also been held that the rights of attaching creditors may properly be determined on a motion for the distribution of a fund among them.[1] Also, although the rule is not universal,[2] it has been held that the junior attaching creditor may come in to the prior attachment suit and defend against the attachment,[3] but this has been held to be a matter resting in the discretion of the court rather than an absolute right.[4]

(2) Time for Proceeding

If an attaching creditor intervenes, he must do so while both attachment suits are pending, but on a motion to defeat a prior attachment the authorities are not agreed as to the necessity of making the motion before judgment.

In case of intervention the attaching creditor must file his petition in intervention while both attachment suits are pending.[5] It has been held that a motion of a junior attaching creditor to defeat a prior attachment must be made before judgment in the prior attachment suit;[6] but there is also authority for the view that such a motion may be made at any time before the proceeds are turned over to the prior attaching creditor.[7]

(3) Jurisdiction

Ordinarily, the court having jurisdiction of the first attachment writ determines questions of priority.

Ordinarily, the court which has jurisdiction over the earliest attachment writs decides questions of priority.[8]

(4) Parties to Intervention

All subsequent attaching creditors are necessary parties in an action by an attaching creditor to vacate a judgment in a prior attachment suit on the ground of fraud.

It has been held that, on intervention by an attaching creditor to vacate a judgment in a prior attachment suit on the ground of fraud, all subsequently attaching creditors are necessary parties.[9]

(5) Notice

Notice must be given to all interested parties.

Where the proceeding is by motion, notice of the motion must be given to all interested parties.[10]

(6) Pleading

The complaint of a subsequently attaching creditor must set forth the facts and state that his claim is a just one. The pleadings must be filed within the proper time.

A complaint by a subsequently attaching creditor must set out facts from which the nature of his alleged lien can be determined, and must state that his claim is a just one.[11] The time for pleading which is allowed to a subsequently attaching creditor who comes in and defends against a prior attachment is the same as that allowed to defendant himself.[12]

(7) Evidence

The general rules as to the burden of proof, and as to the admissibility and weight and sufficiency of the evidence, apply.

The burden of proof is on the party attacking the priority of the attachment lien to show facts sufficient to defeat the priority of such attachment lien,[13] except that in some jurisdictions, under a statute making an attaching creditor a purchaser in good faith from the date of attachment as against unrecorded instruments, such matter is an affirmative defense for which the creditor has the burden of proof.[14] The general rules as to the admissibility[15] and the weight and sufficiency[16] of evidence apply in such a contest.

(8) Judgment

The judgment, in case the subsequent attaching creditor succeeds, should only postpone the first attachment to the subsequent one, and not set it aside entirely.

Where a subsequent attaching creditor succeeds in having his claim preferred to that of the earlier attachment, the judgment should not set aside the first attachment entirely, but should only postpone it to the subsequent one.[17]

(9) Review

Generally, an appeal lies from a decision determining priorities.

It has been held that an appeal will lie from the decision on a motion to determine the priority of attaching creditors;[18] but leave granted to a junior attaching creditor to defend the prior attachment suit has been held not to confer a right to review.[19]

(10) Costs and Interest

A junior attaching creditor who fails in his effort to establish the priority of his lien, ordinarily, is liable for the costs entailed by his proceeding, but not for costs or interest occasioned by other causes

In Massachusetts a junior attaching creditor who is let in to defend is liable for costs in case his defense fails,[20] unless a judgment for costs is entered against the original defendant,[21] but he is not liable for interest on the prior attaching creditor's claim during a delay which was caused by the attachment defendant.[22]

b. Resort to Equity

A subsequently attaching creditor who is denied relief at law may resort to equity to establish his lien as against a prior attaching creditor.

Where the subsequently attaching creditor is denied the right to intervene[23] or to move for discharge,[24] resort can be had to equity to enforce his rights against the prior attaching creditor; and where a judgment creditor fails to exercise his attachment lien and the judgment debtor conveys the property to others who mortgage it, questions as to the rights of such new parties in the attached property affecting the claimed priority of the judgment creditor's right therein under his attachment lien is within the exclusive jurisdiction of equity.[25] However, in a suit by subsequent attaching creditors to establish the priorities of their liens, the court cannot hold that prior attaching creditors, not parties to the suit, have lost their liens.[26]

IX. CUSTODY AND DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY

A. IN GENERAL

§ 280. Nature and Effect of Custody

Goods attached are in the custody of the law and an attaching creditor has no property in or right to possession of the attached property by reason of the levy.

Goods when properly attached are strictly in the custody of the law[27] and an attachment creditor has no interest or property in or right to possession of the attached goods, by reason of the levy,[28] and, usually at least, cannot maintain an action in his own name for violation of possession in the absence of statutory authorization, as explained below in § 292, his remedy, if any, being against the attaching officer.[29] An attaching creditor, by the mere levy of his attachment on land, does not become entitled to the possession of the land or to the rents and profits, and cannot exclude from possession the person rightfully entitled thereto.[30]

In general, where the court has custody of property, it will be retained to await the result of the action, and to satisfy any judgment that may be recovered,[31] and the property remains in the custody of the attaching officer or the officer in control of the property until the suit is disposed of, unless bonded or the attachment is dissolved or the lien otherwise lost.[32] After the discontinuance of an attachment suit, the attaching officer holds the property until he has notice, or acquires knowledge, of the discontinuance.[33]

§ 281. Liabilities for Loss or Destruction of Property

An attaching plaintiff who does not direct the attaching officer as to the care of attached personal property or who does not otherwise participate in any wrongful act or negligence of such officer is not liable for a breach of duty on the part of such officer in respect of the care and custody of such property.

In the absence of any question as to the propriety of the levy of attachment, the attaching plaintiff is not liable for a breach of duty on the part of the attaching officer in failing safely to keep attached personal property, which results in an injury to such property, where such plaintiff did not direct the attaching officer as to the care and custody of the property or otherwise participate in the wrongful acts or negligence of such officer,[34] and in such case both the attaching plaintiff and the defendant must look to the attaching officer and his sureties for redress.[35] The reasons for this conclusion are that the official acts of the attaching officer in respect of the care and custody of attached property are not usually regarded as the acts of an agent of the attaching plaintiff,[36] and that the levy of the attachment does not of itself operate as a satisfaction of plaintiff's claim to the extent of the value of the attached property.[37] In this connection it has been pointed out that the attaching officer derives his power to seize and hold the attached property, neither from the attaching plaintiff nor from defendant, but from the statutes which declare the will of the state and that such officer is no more subject to control or direction from plaintiff than from defendant as to the manner in which he keeps the attached property.[38] It has been held that the attaching plaintiff is not liable for the destruction by fire of the attached goods while in the custody of the attaching officer unless such destruction was directly caused by plaintiff or by the wrongful act of the attaching officer to which plaintiff directly contributed.[39]

There is authority for the view that where a horse levied on died while in possession of the sheriff, owing to his negligence, the attaching creditor was not liable unless the attachment was wrongfully sued out.[40] Where the attachment debtor is under the duty to maintain attached cattle after due notice and they perish because of his neglect to comply with such duty, the loss is that of the attachment debtor,[41] and neither the attaching officer nor the plaintiff in attachment is liable for damages resulting from negligence in the care of cattle on a range, on which a levy of attachment has been made in compliance with statute, where, under the statute, the owner remains in control for the purpose of caring for the cattle and the negligence with respect thereto is chargeable to him.[42]

There is authority for the view that the attaching plaintiff is liable for the wrongful acts of the sheriff in making or permitting changes and alterations in a building in his possession under the levy of a writ of attachment where the sheriff acted under the directions of the attorney for the attaching plaintiff.[43] Where such alterations were made after defendant in the attachment proceedings had executed a lease of the premises, while the right to recover for the decreased rental value is in the lessee,[44] defendant in the attachment proceeding, as lessor, has the right to recover damages resulting from alterations of a permanent character.[45]

Where, in an action for breach of contract, a debt owing to defendant was attached and paid by the debtors to the officer, it was held that, on the default and absconding of the officer before judgment, the loss fell on the attaching plaintiff.[46]

by fire of attached goods while in the hands of the officer has the burden to show that such destruction resulted from the negligence of the attaching creditor.[47]

A petition in an action against the officer and the attaching creditor based on the alleged fact that defendants had wrongfully permitted a third person to use the attached personalty is fatally defective where it fails to allege the history and outcome of the action in which the writ of attachment issued, facts showing damage or injury to the property resulting from its use by the third person, or the nature of such use.[48]

B. RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF ATTACHING OFFICER

§ 282. In General

The attaching officer has the right and duty to keep attached personal property in his possession or under his control.

In making an attachment of personal property it is the right and duty of the attaching officer to take possession of the property (supra § 223) and to keep the property in his possession or under his control,[49] for the benefit of the attaching plaintiff,[50] either personally, or through a keeper, servant, or agent (infra § 284), or bailee or receiptor (infra §§ 296-302).

The fact that it is the right and duty of the attaching officer safely to keep attached personal property does not confer on him the right to prevent the tenant of the premises on which the attached property is located from entering such premises,[51] even where such tenant is the attachment defendant[52] and where the lease is also attached,[53] except possibly for a short period necessary to safeguard the property pending removal.[54] The fact that defendant is allowed access to the building in which the attached property is located in the possession of the agent of the officer does not divest the latter of his custody.[55]

Usually at least the attaching officer has no authority or duty to deliver the attached property to plaintiff in attachment while the attachment suit is still pending,[56] or even, under certain circumstances, after judgment in favor of plaintiff in attachment and issuance of execution[57] So the attaching officer or the court having jurisdiction has no authority to permit plaintiff to use the attached personal property,[58] even on requiring the execution by plaintiff of an indemnity bond.[59] The sheriff has no authority to make or permit changes and alterations in a building while in his possession under a levy of writs of attachment.[60]

The right of plaintiff in attachment to follow the attached property into the hands of a third person who has acquired rights from the attachment defendant after the attachment depends on the reality of the sheriff's possession under the attachment,[61] and where plaintiff in attachment, who had had possession of the property as keeper for the sheriff, voluntarily permits the property to go out of his possession and has knowledge that defendant in attachment is negotiating for the sale of the property, plaintiff may not successfully question the title of the purchaser[62]

§ 283. Nature of Taking and Possession

a. General considerations
b. Property incapable of manual seizure

a. General Considerations

The question as to what is sufficient custody depends largely on the particular circumstances. Possession by the attaching officer may constitute constructive possession by the plaintiff in attachment.

What act, what species of possession, and what degree of vigilance will constitute legal custody is often a question of difficulty, depending upon a variety of circumstances, having respect to the nature and situation of the property and the purposes for which custody and vigilance are required, and especially to the notice to other officers and persons having conflicting claims.[63]

While, as shown above in § 281, it has been held that the attaching officer is not the agent of the attaching party in respect of official acts of such officer in respect of the care and custody of the attached property so as to render such party liable for injuries to the property resulting from the acts or negligence of the attaching officer, it has been held in a case in which the question involved was as to the right of plaintiff in attachment to assert rights in respect of the violation of possession, that property which is in the custody of the attaching officer is constructively in the possession of such plaintiff through the officer as his agent.[64]

b. Property Incapable of Manual Seizure

In respect of property incapable of manual seizure, the attaching officer may have the right to actual possession for the purpose of preserving it. While it has been held that the attaching officer must use ordinary care for the preservation of such property, some statutes relieve him to some extent from strict liability.

Where an officer makes a constructive levy on property, which by reason of its bulk or for other cause cannot be immediately removed, as considered above in § 223, he does not deprive himself of the right to regain actual possession of the property whenever necessary for its preservation.[65] According to some cases, his liability to have such property forthcoming, that it may be taken on execution, is the same as if it had been taken into his actual possession, and the property is regarded as constructively in his possession, and he must use ordinary care and diligence for its preservation and safe-keeping.[66] Some statutes governing the attachment of property of the type considered in this section relieve the attaching officer, to some extent from the more stringent liabilities of the common law in relation to the attached property,[67] and it has even been said that, after a compliance with the statute, such officer has nothing further to do until execution, at least so long as the difficulty of removal remains.[68]

§ 284. —— Delivery to Keeper, Servant, or Agent

The attaching officer may deliver the attached property to a keeper or custodian and possession by such keeper or custodian constitutes possession by the attaching officer.

An attaching officer need not retain personal possession of the attached property, but may deliver it to a keeper, servant, or agent, whose possession will be regarded as the possession of the officer.[69] This rule has been applied or recognized where the attaching officer designates as keeper plaintiff in attachment,[70] or defendant in attachment.[71]

There is authority for the view that a keeper appointed by an attaching officer is not authorized to delegate his authority to another even though the written authorization given to him is directed to himself or bearer.[72]

§ 285. —— Allowing Debtor to Use Property

Questions as to the abandonment of the attachment by attaching officer's permitting the debtor to use attached property are considered above in § 264.

§ 286. —— Delivery of Property to Claimant

Where a third person claims to be the owner of attached goods, the officer may in his discretion release the same to him, but he does so at his peril, and the burden is upon him to establish that such property did not belong to attachment defendant.[73]

§ 287. —— Return of Property to Debtor

There is authority for the view that, where the attaching officers leave attached personal property in the possession of the defendant in attachment, such property is no longer in custodia legis.

While the view has been expressed that the attaching officer may designate defendant in attachment as keeper, as appears above in § 284, it has broadly been stated that when personal property on which a levy of attachment has been made is left by the attaching officer in the debtor's possession, it ceases to be in custodia legis, and may be taken by other creditors.[74]

Various questions as to the termination of the attachment by returning the attached property to the debtor are considered above in § 264, and as to the revival of the attachment by a redelivery by the debtor to such officer, above in § 271.

§ 288. Place of Custody

In general the officer may keep the attached property in whatever place he wishes. The removal of attached property by the attaching officer or his bailee from the state in which the attachment issued does not terminate such officer's special property therein.

In general where property is taken under attachment it is immaterial in what place it is kept by the officer.[75]

Attached personal property may be regarded as in the custody and possession of the attaching officer notwithstanding plaintiff in attachment is in control of the building in which such property is stored.[76]

Under some statutes, defendant in attachment, on making due request in writing, may, under certain circumstances, require the attaching officer to remove the attached property from such defendant's premises, or the keeper, within a reasonable time, notwithstanding a demand by mortgagees of the attached property for payment by the attachment creditor of the amount due the mortgagees where the request for removal was made within the time fixed by statute for payment or tender by the attachment creditor of the amount due the mortgagees in order to maintain the attachment.[77]

Removal from state. The removal by the attaching officer or his bailee of attached goods from the state in which the attachment issued will not discharge the attaching officer's special property therein.[78]

§ 289. Extent of Officer's Interest

a. In general
b. Property of tenants in common
c. Termination of official term

a. In General

The attaching officer has a special interest or property in attached personalty and the right to possession

The attaching officer on taking personal property under a writ of attachment acquires a special interest or property therein,[79] and the right to possession[80] against any one claiming the property under a title to which the lien of the attachment is superior.[81] The attaching officer may enforce his special interest in the property for the protection of all concerned,[82] and, as explained below in § 292, may maintain an appropriate action to protect or enforce his special property or interest in the attached property.

The special property of the attaching officer depends on his liability to answer for the attached personalty to the attaching creditor or the debtor,[83] and his special property ceases when his liability is discharged.[84]

84. Holt v. Burbank, supra.

The special title of the attaching officer in attached personalty cannot be defeated by trustee process in an action against the attachment debtor, in which the person in possession of the attached property is named as trustee.[85]

The attaching officer has only such special interest in attached property in his possession as the lien of the attachment creates.[86] The view has been expressed that the special interest or property is measured by the amount necessary to pay the debt for which the property has been attached,[87] or, under some circumstances, by the amount of the judgment in the attachment action.[88] Questions as to the extent of the lien of an attachment in general are considered above in §§ 257–259.

b. Property of Tenants in Common

The attaching officer may be entitled to the possession and control of the whole property owned by tenants in common, which is attached in an action against one of them

Where personal property owned by tenants in common is attached in a suit against one of them the officer is entitled to the possession and control of the whole under certain circumstances at least,[89] but his authority does not extend to making a division of the property so as to set apart the share of the tenant sued, as explained above in § 234

c. Termination of Official Term

The attaching officer has the duty to keep the attached property and have it forthcoming on demand even though not demanded until after the close of his official term.

It is the duty of the officer levying an attachment to keep the property and have it forthcoming on demand, even though not demanded until after the close of his official term.[90]

§ 290. Payment into Court

While the attaching officer may under some circumstances pay into court money which is subject to an attachment lien, he should not be required to do so in the absence of a statutory requirement to that effect.

In the absence of statutory directions to that effect, the attaching officer should not be ordered to pay into court money which he has attached or which is in his hands as the proceeds of attached property;[91] but he may do so, and in such case the money, when so paid into court, is still subject to the lien of attachment to the same extent and effect as if retained in the hands of the attaching officer.[92]

§ 291. Permitting Examination of Books and Papers

The right to examine attached books and papers has been recognized, and also denied.

While there are expressions to the effect that an attaching officer is not bound to permit parties whose books and papers are in his custody by virtue of a levy under a writ of attachment to examine them,[93] there is authority for the view that a plaintiff who has caused the sheriff to levy an attachment on property of the debtor, and on books and papers of the debtor relating to such property, has a right to examine the books and papers by leave of the court so far as is necessary to enable him to enforce the attachment.[94]

§ 292. Actions for Violation of Possession

a. Right of action
b. Form of action
c. Persons liable

e. Defenses
f Jurisdiction

a. Right of Action

The attaching officer, and usually only such officer, has, in the absence of statutory permission, the right to maintain an action for violation of possession of attached personal property

The attaching officer acquires a special property in, and the right to possession of, attached personal property, as explained above in §§ 282, 289, and his title or interest is sufficient to support an action for a violation of such possession.[95]

Action for conversion
The attaching officer may maintain

While there is authority for the view that the special interest which an attaching creditor has in attached personal property held by the officer as such creditor's agent is a sufficient foundation for an action for conversion,[96] and that the attaching plaintiff to whom the attached property had been delivered for the purpose of sale may maintain an action of trover against a person who wrongfully took the property from the attaching plaintiff,[97] in the absence of a statute to the contrary, in general the right of action for violation of possession lies exclusively with the attaching officer,[98] and the attaching creditor, as a rule, acquires no such interest in the attached property as to give him a right of action for a violation of the officer's possession[99]

While the view has been expressed that a statutory provision that where, after execution against property has been issued on a judgment for plaintiff in an action in which a warrant of attachment has been issued, the property has passed out of the hands of the sheriff without sale thereof or conversion into money, and the attachment has not been discharged, a person who willfully conceals or withholds such property from the sheriff is liable to double damages at the suit of the party aggrieved, authorizes an action by the attachment and judgment creditor if the case is otherwise within the provisions of the statute,[1] the right of action of such creditor must be confined to the cases provided for by the statute since the right of action exists solely by force of the statute,[2] and the action may be prosecuted solely for an injury occasioned by a willful withholding and concealment of property from the sheriff.[3] Such statute apparently contemplates only an injury to the person aggrieved by such an appropriation of the property as deprives such person altogether of the benefit thereof, and, in respect of an attachment and execution plaintiff, such an injury cannot be shown until by a return of the process it is demonstrated that the execution remains uncollected and that the property taken from the sheriff cannot be recovered by him and its proceeds applied on the judgment.[4] Such statute does not apply where there is not a levy on personal property capable of manual delivery.[5]

b. Form of Action

(1) In general
(2) Contempt proceedings

(1) In General

The attaching officer may maintain an action of replevin, trespass, or trover for a violation of his possession, according to the particular circumstances

The form of the action by an attaching officer for violation of his possession may, according to the particular circumstances, be either replevin,[6] trespass,[7] or trover.[8]

The officer may not maintain an action of trover where he did not acquire possession of the property under the writ of attachment involved.[9]

(2) Contempt Proceedings

Contempt proceedings will lie against a stranger to a suit who wrongfully interferes with property attached therein.

A stranger to a pending suit may be proceeded against as for contempt for interfering with property attached therein.[10]

c. Persons Liable

The attaching officer may enforce his special property or interest in, and his right to possession of, attached personal property both against a stranger to the action and also against the defendant in attachment, who wrongfully disturbs or interferes with such possession.

The attaching officer may enforce his special property or interest in, and right to possession of, attached personal property both against any stranger to the action who wrongfully disturbs or interferes with such possession,[11] and also against defendant in attachment under like circumstances.[12] So the attaching officer may proceed against one to whom such officer delivered the property for safe-keeping as a bailee for hire,[13] against the transferee of a custodian of the property who held it subject to the right of the attaching officer to take possession,[14] against a joint owner of personal property who has forcibly retaken the property after its taking under a writ of attachment against his coowner,[15] and against another officer who violates possession of the attaching officer,[16] as, for example, against another officer who wrongfully takes possession of the property under a writ of replevin,[17] or under another writ of attachment.[18]

d. Conditions Precedent

A demand for the return of attached property is not a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action for conversion where the defendant in such action has wrongfully destroyed such property.

A demand for the return of attached property is not necessary in an action for the conversion thereof where it has been destroyed by the wrongful act of defendant in such action.[19]

e. Defenses

Informality or irregularity in the attachment proceeding or a release of the levy may defeat an action based on an alleged violation of the attaching officer's possession.

While, in an action by an officer who had made a levy on certain property under a warrant of attachment against another officer who subsequently made a levy on the same property under another warrant of attachment, the right of defendant to attack the validity of the warrant under which plaintiff acted has seriously been questioned,[20] notwithstanding a recognition by the court of the right of a party not a party to the action in which a warrant of attachment is executed, under ordinary circumstances, collaterally to attack the validity of such warrant,[21] there is authority for the view that informality or irregularity in the attachment proceedings may be available as a defense in an action by the attaching officer for a violation of his possession.[22]

The fact that the attaching officer released the levy of attachment at the direction of the attachment creditor may defeat such officer's right to recover for an alleged conversion of the attached property.[23]

In an action against defendant in attachment for the conversion of personal property attached by destroying such property, defendant may not successfully contend that the attachment had been lost because no attempt had been made to levy an execution within a specified time after the rendition of the judgment, where the property was destroyed before the judgment was rendered.[24]

f. Jurisdiction

The attaching officer may maintain an action, based on his special title, in another state to which the property has been taken.

The special title which an attaching officer has in the property levied on is sufficient to permit him to assert his title by an action in another state to which the property has been taken.[25]

g. Evidence

In general, any relevant and competent evidence bearing on plaintiff's right to possession, on defendant's wrongful interference with such right, or on the amount of damages is admissible.

In trover by a sheriff for property attached parol evidence is admissible to show the delivery of the execution to him and the time of that delivery in order to hold the property subject to the attachment,[26] and proof of a fraudulent purchase by defendant of the goods in question from the attachment debtor is admissible as explaining his acts in intermeddling therewith.[27]

Evidence that the property did not in fact belong to defendant in the attachment and that he had no attachable interest therein is admissible.[28]

Evidence as to the value of the goods in the ordinary course of trade is admissible,[29] and it has also been held that facts occurring after the commencement of the action might be shown as bearing on the quantum of damages.[30] It seems that, in trespass by an officer against a person other than the attachment debtor for taking property attached, defendant cannot show, in mitigation of damages, that part of the property was exempt from attachment.[31]

h. Damages

In general, the measure of damages is the value of the personal property involved in an action by the attaching officer for the violation of his possession where the return of the property is not involved.

In an action by an attaching officer for the violation of his possession, not involving a return of the property, the measure of damages is the value of the personal property involved,[32] at the time of the taking,[33] with interest[34] not exceeding the amount required to satisfy the writ.[35] Where, however, there has been no conversion by defendant to his own use, the measure of damages has been held to be the injury caused by the removal, not the value of the property.[36]

If the attaching creditor has failed to perfect his lien by taking out execution within the statutory period only nominal damages can be recovered by the officer.[37]

Double damages. In order to permit plaintiff in attachment to recover double damages, pursuant to a statute authorizing such recovery by the party aggrieved from a person who willfully conceals or withholds from the attaching officer attached personal property which has passed out of the hands of such officer under certain circumstances, the facts must be such as to bring the case within the provisions of such statute.[38]

§ 293. Charges for Care of Property

a. Right to reimbursement and compensation
b. Necessity and reasonableness of expenses
c. Persons liable
d. Allowance and enforcement

a. Right to Reimbursement and Compensation

In general, the attaching officer is entitled to reimbursement of necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by him in keeping the attached property.

As it is the duty of an officer, under a writ of attachment, to take and retain possession of the property levied on at his peril (supra § 282), he is entitled to reimbursement of actually necessary and reasonable expenses incurred by him in the performance of this duty,[39] such as the compensation of a keeper whom he has put in charge of the property,[40] or the expense of regaining possession of property which has wrongfully been taken out of his hands

A custodian appointed by the levying officer to care for live stock attached is entitled to reasonable compensation for the care, feed, and stabling of such stock from the time of his appointment until notified of the release of the attachment[42] A claimant of live stock, who remains in possession of live stock, notwithstanding an attachment, without giving the bond required by statute, is not, however, entitled, on vacation of the attachment, to recover from plaintiff in the attachment for taking care of such live stock[43]

main action is entitled to compensation for the use of certain barges by the attaching officer for storage of property which was attached while on such barges.[44]

b. Necessity and Reasonableness of Expenses

In general, the charges must be reasonable and necessary.

The charges must be reasonable and necessary for the purposes for which they are incurred,[45] and in the proper exercise of the duty to take and retain possession.[46]

The mere fact that the attached property is more or less of a ponderous nature and physically annexed to the soil does not prevent the allowance of a keeper's fee, where such property might to a large extent have been dismantled and carried away.[47] It is not necessary, under all circumstances, to gather together in one place all the attached property, and the fact that the property is kept in different places does not necessarily show that maintaining keepers in such places was not a necessary expense.[48]

c. Persons Liable

(1) Debtor or defendant in attachment
(2) Creditor or plaintiff in attachment
(3) Persons other than attachment defendant or plaintiff
(4) Persons directly liable to custodian

(1) Debtor or Defendant in Attachment

In general, the expense of keeping and caring for the attached property falls ultimately on the attachment defendant where judgment in the action goes against him.

As the officer is entitled, in case he has paid the expenses of keeping and caring for the attached property and judgment in the action goes against defendant, to deduct such expenses from the proceeds of the attached property before turning them over to the attaching creditor in satisfaction of his debt, as explained below in subsection d (4) of this section, it is apparent that, under such circumstances, the cost of such care and custody falls eventually on defendant.[49] The expense of keeping the property of a third person cannot be imposed on an unsuccessful defendant.[50]

In general, where defendant in attachment prevails, either in the principal action or with respect to the propriety of the attachment, he cannot be held liable for the expense of keeping the property while the officer held it under the attachment,[51] and the officer has no lien on the property or its proceeds as against defendant.[52]

Where defendant contracts to pay the expenses of keeping attached property, he is liable on such contract, and the officer is not bound to credit the sum so received on his legal charges.[53] An agreement between the sheriff and a person with whom the sheriff stored attached property as to liability for storage charges has no binding effect on defendant in attachment or his administrator, where the writ of attachment has been dismissed.[54]

Where the possession of property is illegally acquired under color of an attachment, the officer cannot charge the attachment defendant for keeping the property.[55]

Maintenance of live stock. If live stock is attached and defendant does not have it released on bond, he is bound to care for it and is responsible for such expense if judgment is entered against him.[56]

(2) Creditor or Plaintiff in Attachment

In general, plaintiff in attachment becomes liable for the expense of keeping the attached property if the action is dismissed, the attachment is discharged, or defendant prevails on final determination of the cause.

If an attachment suit is dismissed, the attachment is discharged, or defendant prevails on the final determination of the cause, the expenses of keeping the property must, in general, be paid by plaintiff,[57] and the officer has no lien on the property or its proceeds as against defendant, as explained above in subsection c (1) of this section.

Under an agreement between plaintiff in attachment and claimants of the attached property who were not parties to the attachment suit, providing for the release of the levy by such plaintiff and an order by him on the attaching officer to return the attached property to such claimants, such plaintiff, on releasing the levy and making the order, is not liable for the expense of the care and disposal of the attached property, in the absence of any provision in the agreement imposing such liability on him.[58]

(3) Persons Other than Attachment Defendant or Plaintiff

Usually a person other than the attachment creditor or defendant, who owns or has an interest in the attached property, is not liable for expenses in connection with the attached property in the absence of an agreement imposing liability on him.

Where the attaching officer wrongfully seizes and sells property which is subsequently adjudged to belong to a third person, he cannot, as against such true owner, retain the costs of the seizure and sale.[59] So, in general, a mortgagee of the property attached cannot be held liable for the cost of keeping it.[60]

Where an officer seizes property which is not attachable because the interest of attachment defendant is that of mortgagee and the property remains in the hands of the mortgagor with the right of redemption, the officer or his bailee may not hold the property as against the mortgagor to compel reimbursement of money expended in discharge of a prior lien.[61]

The owner of attached property other than the attachment defendant may become liable for the expense of caring for and keeping such property under an implied contract.[62]

Under some statutes, the attaching officer is not liable to the attachment defendant for the amount of the necessary costs of the sale of the attached property, which such officer deducted from the proceeds and retained before paying over the proceeds of sale to defendant on the latter's giving bond to dissolve the attachment, notwithstanding defendant prevailed in the action.[63]

(4) Persons Directly Liable to Custodian

In general, a sheriff who employs a custodian is liable to such custodian for the latter's compensation. The custodian has no claim against the attaching plaintiff unless the services are rendered at the instance or request of such plaintiff.

While there is authority for the view that the sheriff by employing a keeper does not make himself personally responsible to such keeper unless he has done so expressly,[64] ordinarily, where the sheriff appoints a custodian to keep and care for the attached property, he is liable to such custodian either under his express contract or for a reasonable compensation.[65] So, a sheriff who employs a keeper without obtaining an order of court, in accordance with a statutory requirement, becomes personally liable for the keeper's compensation,[66] and the sheriff may not rely on his failure to obtain such order to relieve himself from such liability.[67] In such case the appointee is under no obligation to determine as to whether or not the order has been obtained.[68]

The custodian has no claim against the attaching plaintiff or creditor for his services,[69] except where

Cattle in possession of attachment defendant under conditional sales contract

(1) An attaching officer's possession of attached cattle which he had taken from the attachment defendant, who had possession of the cattle under a conditional sales contract, was that of an individual only, in respect of the liability of the seller for the expense of caring for and keeping such cattle, after the attachment defendant's abandonment of his interest in the cattle and the attaching officer's tender of the cattle to the seller—Collins v. Lewis, 149 A 668, 111 Conn 299.

(2) Such seller became liable to the attaching officer for the expense of the care and keeping of the cattle after the seller's refusal of the tender on the ground that he was not able to receive the cattle at the time of tender, where the attaching officer informed the seller that he was holding the cattle for the seller and would look to the latter for the expense of keeping the cattle and the seller subsequently sold the cattle and gave a receipt therefor to the attaching officer on relinquishment of possession by such officer—Collins v Lewis, supra

Care of animal with consent of owner

While, when a person's property is taken from his possession by the unlawful act of an officer, such person is not liable to pay for the keep of such property in the interim, one who furnished feed for an animal with the consent of the owner is entitled to recover compensation therefor from the owner—Summerton Live Stock Co. v Cleveland Mfg Co, 103 S E 516, 114 S C 186 such services were rendered at the instance or request of such creditor or plaintiff.[70]

In an action against the officer for the compensation of the custodian, it is no defense that the officer has no claim against another for the performance of such services.[71] So, as between the officer and the custodian, the validity of the levy is not material.[72] The fact that a person was in the employ of the owner, trustee, or receiver of attached property during a part or all of the time that he was in charge of such property as keeper under appointment by a sheriff, does not prevent his recovering from the sheriff the reasonable value of his services as a keeper.[73]

d. Allowance and Enforcement

(1) In general
(2) Amount
(3) Taxation as costs
(4) Lien, deduction from proceeds, and retention of possession

(1) In General

The method, if any, prescribed by statute for determining compensation must be pursued.

Where a statute provides the method of determining the compensation, as by allowance of the court, such method must be pursued.[74]

While in some jurisdictions plaintiff in attachment, who cared for attached cattle under a contract with the sheriff, cannot recover under such contract by way of costs where the sheriff did not obtain an order of court to make the contract,[75] plaintiff is entitled to a reasonable compensation not to exceed that agreed on between himself and the sheriff.[76]

Where an attaching officer uses attached property and the use is sufficient to pay for the keeping, such officer may not maintain an action against the attachment plaintiff for the expense of such keeping.[77]

An issue between the keeper of attached property, appointed pursuant to an order of court, and the attachment debtor as to board furnished by such defendant to the keeper while the latter was in possession of the property cannot be adjudicated in the main action to which the keeper is not a party.[78]

The view has been expressed that, where plaintiff in attachment is entitled to an allowance for storage charges for the period during which the attached property was kept on barges owned by such plaintiff, the allowance may properly be made at any time before the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the attached property and as an incident to such distribution, where the court by its order of sale reserved, and actually retained, control over the disposition of the proceeds.[79]

(2) Amount

A statutory provision fixing the amount to be allowed for the care and custody of the attached property controls. The amount of the just and reasonable expenses incurred should be allowed in the absence of a statutory provision fixing the amount.

If the amount to be allowed for the care and custody of attached property is fixed by statute, such limit cannot be exceeded.[80] If the amount is not, fixed by statute, the officer should be allowed the just and equitable expenses incurred in the proper care and keeping of the property while in his custody.[81]

Ordinarily, the amount is fixed by the officer who issued the writ,[82] or by the court,[83] whose discre-

Property kept in excess of specified time Determination as to fees to which

tion in regard to such allowance is sometimes controlled by statute.[84]

A person who had been appointed by the sheriff as keeper of attached property, without an order of court required by statute, is entitled to recover from the sheriff a reasonable compensation from the time of his appointment to the time when he surrendered or was required to surrender, possession of the attached property to some other person.[85]

(3) Taxation as Costs

While it has been considered that charges for keeping and preserving attached property are not taxable in the ordinary way as costs, in some jurisdictions such charges are taxable as costs.

While it has been considered that charges for keeping and preserving attached property are not taxable in the ordinary way as costs,[86] or as costs which abide the event of the suit,[87] the practice of taxing such charges as costs prevails in a number of jurisdictions.[88]

Intervention in an attachment proceeding by a person who submits a claim for rent of premises in which the attached goods were located, for the period during which such premises were retained by an officer until the goods were sold, may be treated as a motion to tax the costs, within the meaning of a statute for taxing as costs the necessary expense of keeping the attached property.[89]

(4) Lien, Deduction from Proceeds, and Retention of Possession

The charges of the officer sometimes constitute a lien on the attached property, to be satisfied before the proceeds are applied on the execution where plaintiff succeeds in the action.

Where plaintiff succeeds in the action the charges of the officer for keeping attached property have been held to constitute a lien on the same which must be satisfied before the proceeds of the sale of the property are applied on the execution,[90] and it is not necessary, in order to preserve this lien, that a charge should be taxed as costs and included in the execution.[91] Under some statutes garage charges for the safe-keeping of an attached automobile constitute a lien on the attached property.[92]

The right of the attaching officer or officer in charge of the attached property to retain possession of the property until certain expenses for the keeping of such property have been paid has been recognized under some statutes.[93]

The propriety of paying the expenses of preservan attaching officer securing property himself on the keeper's discharge after ten days was entitled, under St (1913) c 611 § 1, was within the sound discretion of the court—Helliwell Garages v Feinberg, 126 N E 476, 235 Mass. 258.

Empire Fuel Co, (C C.A Ohio) 270 F. 930, 932

Facts not showing want of due diligence

The facts under consideration did not show want of due diligence on the part of plaintiff in attachment, in prosecuting the action, and he was not, therefore, prevented from taxing as costs keeper's fees—Callahan v. Danziger, 158 P. 760, 172 Cal. 738

In Oregon

(1) The view has been expressed that, where a keeper is necessary, the expense is in the nature of a disbursement which plaintiff might lawfully make and which he might tax in the cause if he should prevail—Hawley v Dawson, 18 P 592, 16 Or. 344

(2) It seems, however, that expenditures of the officer for taking care of the property do not, like taxable costs, abide the event of the action but are a charge on the assets—Schneider v Sears, 8 P. 841, 13 Or 69

(3) Furthermore, the view has been expressed that the expense of keeping property held under attachment is neither a cost nor a disbursement under the statute, since the reasonableness of such charges is not and cannot be fixed by law, and that the clerk, who is a ministerial officer, cannot determine the amount due nor tax the same—Mitchell, etc, Co v. Downing, 32 P. 394, 23 Or 448

(4) The reasonableness of the charges of the officer for the care of the attached property should be determined by the court, on notice to plaintiff in attachment, and the amount as so determined should be entered as costs and disbursements against plaintiff and in favor of the officer, where the action has been settled and plaintiff agreed to pay the costs—Mitchell, etc, Co. v. Downing, supra

Payment by attachment defendant

It has been held that the owner of an attached automobile, who was the attachment defendant, must pay garage charges in order to obtain possession.—Bentinck v. Menotti, 275 P. 850, 97 Cal App. 412.

ing and selling the attached property out of the proceeds of such property has been recognized, where such property was delivered to an assignee for the benefit of creditors of the owner under an agreement between the assignor, the assignee, and the attachment creditor that the property should be converted into money and the proceeds held to await the event of the attachment suit and the suit was determined in favor of the attachment creditor.[94]

§ 294. Release of Property by Direction of Parties

In general, the attaching officer may properly release the attached property where he is directed to do so by the attaching creditor or such creditor's attorney, or by both parties to the attachment action.

The attaching officer is justified in releasing the attached property where the attaching creditor or such creditor's attorney directs such release,[95] and, a fortiori, the officer is justified in releasing the property where plaintiff and defendant in the attachment suit agree on terms of settlement and thereupon direct him to release the property.[96]

The right of plaintiff in attachment to recover for damages to attached property against a person to whom the attaching officer, with the permission of plaintiff, delivered the attached property, on receiving from such person an indemnity bond, has been recognized, where the evidence showed a specific agreement or understanding on the part of the person to whom the property was delivered that his use of the property would be at his own risk of injury thereto, and the injury to the property, as to which recovery is sought, occurred while the property was in such person's possession.[97] In such case the proper measure of damages is the extent to which the attachment lien was depreciated by the injury to the property;[98] but, if, after the injury, the market value of the property was sufficient to satisfy the attachment lien, plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything.[99]

§ 295. Release of Surplus Property or Proceeds

Questions concerning the amount of property to be attached and as to the effect of an excessive levy have been considered in § 235, and those concerning the release of an excessive levy and the disposition of any surplus on sale of the property will be discussed in § 335. Questions other than these, if any such may arise in future cases involving the release of surplus property or proceeds by the attaching officer, will be treated in the Pocket Parts under this section number.

C. DELIVERY TO RECEIPTOR OR BAILEE

§ 296. In General

The attaching officer may, in the absence of a statutory prohibition, place the attached property in the hands of a receiptor or bailee for safekeeping.

An officer who attaches personal property may, in the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, deliver possession of it to a receiptor,[1] and the practice is said to be coeval with the practice of making such attachments.[2] It is in its nature a simple deposit, a delivery of the property to be kept by the depositary without compensation until called for by the attaching officer, and the relation of the receiptor and the officer is that of bailor and bailee,[3] this fact distinguishing the delivery of property to a receiptor from the situation which arises wherein, as has been considered in section 284, the officer places the attached property in the hands of a keeper, servant, or agent who becomes a mere custodian and servant of the attaching officer,[4] although the officer, it should be noted, may surrender the custody of the property to a bailee for hire, who is neither a keeper in this sense nor a receiptor.[5]

Under this practice property is sometimes receipted to be held by the receiptor, it is sometimes receipted to be left with or returned to defendant for his use, and is sometimes receipted to be used up or sold by defendant;[6] and any person sui juris, wheth-

When garage owner not receiptor

A garage owner whose employee, to whom the attaching officer delivered an attached automobile, was authorized only to receive cars for safe-keeping and issue tags, or checks, and who issued only a check, was not a keeper or receiptor, in the absence of a special agreement by the owner to serve as such receiptor. —Guttentag v Huntley, 139 N E. 501, 245 Mass 212.

6. McDermott v. Jaquith, 92 A. 230, 88 Vt. 240.

er plaintiff[7] or defendant[8] in the attachment suit, claimant of the attached property,[9] or an indifferent person,[10] may be the receiptor.

The taking of a receipt by the officer is purely a voluntary act;[11] and the receipt is taken solely for the benefit and security of the officer.[12]

Where the attaching creditor, or his attorney, consents to the officer's taking a receipt for the attached property, and approves of the receiptor, the officer is generally held to be relieved from all liability for losses not occasioned by his neglect or misfeasance,[13] although a mere direction to the officer that he may take receiptors has been held not to release him from his official liability for the ultimate responsibility of the receiptors in case he allows the property to pass into their hands,[14] and the officer is liable for the tort or neglect of a receiptor to whom he intrusts the property without the agency of the creditor.[15]

§ 297. Form and Requisites of Receipt

There is no prescribed form for a receipt, and its effectiveness as such is determined by the law of contracts and bailments.

Where the officer delivers the attached property to a bailee for safekeeping no particular agreement is necessary,[16] and in the absence of a statutory provision therefor no writing is required,[17] although it would seem that the convenience and safety of the parties would render some writing showing the facts necessary in cases where the number of the articles attached is considerable.[18] However, a simple receipt admitting that the articles enumerated had been delivered by the officer to the receiptor for safekeeping and to be returned on request is sufficient.[19] On the other hand, since it is not necessarily a mere receipt and evidence of a deposit, the writing may contain stipulations with relation to various matters on the one side or the other, varying the obligations imposed by the law on the depositary,[20] and as it is nothing more than the written evidence of the contract of bailment entered into by the officer and receiptor, its form is a matter of voluntary agreement between them, and the rights and liabilities of the parties to it must be determined by its fair construction.[21]

Where the contrary does not appear, it will be assumed that the receipt was in common form.[22]

The delivery of goods under an attachment by an officer is a sufficient consideration for the contract of a receiptor making himself responsible thereby for the amount of debt and damages claimed in the writ.[23]

b On attachment lien
c. Estoppel

a. In General

A receipt is treated as a contract of bailment.

A receipt for attached property is treated as a contract[24] between the receiptor and the attaching officer.[25]

The possession of a receiptor of property which has been taken by a lawful writ is, in law, that of the officer to whom he is accountable.[26]

The relation of creditor and debtor between a surety on an officer's receipt of attached property and the attachment creditor arises at the very time the suretyship begins.[27]

b. On Attachment Lien

Surrender of goods attached on receipt does not dissolve the attachment, except as to strangers to the action or to the receipt.

tached property does not, as a rule, affect the attachment lien, but the goods are regarded as still under the officer's control.[28] Moreover, the mere fact that the receiptor returns the property to the debtor does not affect the attachment[29] Where, however, the rights of innocent third parties are concerned, the attachment as to them must be regarded as dissolved;[30]

Where the receipt is in the alternative to pay a fixed sum or to redeliver the property, the receiptor has the right to elect which he will do, and the attachment is dissolved[31]

The failure of the officer to take a receipt in writing does not dissolve the attachment.[32]

c. Estoppel

(1) In general
(2) As to right of receiptor to assert interest in property
(3) As to valuation

(1) In General

A receiptor is estopped to deny the attachment, or consideration for the receipt.

A receipt for attached property is conclusive on the receiptor as to the attachment of the property described therein,[33] and the receiptor is concluded from setting up want of consideration for the execution of the receipt.[34]

A receipt providing that the receiptor is estopped to deny the attachment, ownership of defendant, and the stipulated value of the property seized is not against public policy[35]

(2) As to Right of Receiptor to Assert Interest in Property

A receiptor is not precluded from asserting his own title, or that of a claimant, except by his conduct or by an express provision of the receipt; an estoppel by contract terminates on redelivery.

It is generally held that, in an action on a simple accountable receipt, in which there is a mere promise to redeliver the property to the attaching officer with no direct admission of defendant's title, the receiptor may, in defense, assert his own title to, or lien on, the property, or that of another to whom he has returned it[36] However, a receiptor may estop himself to deny the debtor's title to the attached property in an action on the receipt, as where the receipt contains an express recital of an estoppel;[37] or where it contains an express admission of the debtor's title, with a promise to return the goods, or pay the judgment, not to exceed the stipulated valuation of the property;[38] or where the conduct of the receiptor who himself owns, or has a lien on, the goods has induced the officer to believe that they belong to the debtor,[39] or where the contract is a mere substitute

Right to possession not affected

"The claim, that when the oxen and the cow passed into the plaintiff's hands after they were receipted for the attachment was dissolved, cannot be sustained. The attachment was still in force for the security of the attaching creditors, and the officer, by virtue of it, could take the property from the debtor as well as from the receiptor. As between the debtor and the officer, the attachment was subsisting The special property acquired by the officer under his attachment remained, and he could assert it at any time, unless the rights of third parties had intervened"—Buzzell v Hardy, 58 N H 331, 332, quoted in Sweeney v. Bona fide purchasers and attaching creditors

Where property is attached and then given to a receiptor and the property is sold to a bona fide purchaser or attached by other creditors, the attachment, as to them, must be regarded as discharged by delivery to the receiptor.—Stewart v Stewart Drug Co, 102 A. 823, 117 Me 84.

Temporary receiver in bankruptcy

for the security by attachment, and is, in effect, but an agreement to indemnify the officer for not making an attachment;[40] or where, although the property was not in fact attachable, the officer is still liable, either to plaintiff, defendant, or the true owner.[41]

The estoppel extends only for the duration of the receiptor's liability, and terminates when the goods have been redelivered to the sheriff.[42]

(3) As to Valuation

Where a valuation of the property attached is stipulated in the receipt, this is conclusive between the receiptor and the attaching officer.

The valuation fixed by the receiptor and officer is conclusive as between themselves, either in assumpsit or trover.[43] Where, however, the property is redelivered, but in a damaged condition, the recitals of the receipt are only prima facie evidence of the value.[44]

§ 299. Rights, Duties, and Liabilities of Receiptor

a. In general
b. Indemnity or reimbursement of receiptor
c Redelivery of property
d. Conversion

a. In General

The rights, duties, and liabilities of a receiptor are determined by the terms of his receipt and the law of bailments.

A receiptor's liability on his undertaking is dependent on its terms, and on the law of bailments;[45] but it may be stated generally that such liability is limited by that of the attaching officer, and when that is discharged the receiptor can no longer be held.[46] It is, therefore, obvious that a receiptor is not, by reason of a common receipt, a surety or guarantor of the debt on which the suit was brought,[47] nor is his liability for loss of goods absolute and unconditional.[48]

b. Indemnity or Reimbursement of Receiptor

Where a receiptor has received from the debtor an indemnity bond, he may sue on such bond for injuries sustained by the debtor's nonpayment of his debt.

A receiptor cannot claim reimbursement for money paid out by him on an execution against an attachment debtor, where the execution has been satisfied by an execution on the debtor's lands the receiptor taking a deed thereto as security for the amount paid the creditor;[49] but where he has received a bond to indemnify him for having given a receipt to an officer for attached goods, he is damnified by an attachment of his own property in a suit on his receipt to the officer, and may thereupon bring an action on such bond.[50]

Receipt not a waiver of title

"The plaintiff [did not] waive his title to the property by receipting for it This was legally entirely consistent with an intention ultimately to assert title, should circumstances render it desirable for him so to do. 48. Ide v Fassett, 45 Vt. 68.

49. Woodward v. Munson, 126 Mass. 102

50. Otis v. Blake, 6 Mass. 336.

(1) Duty to Redeliver on Demand

The receiptor must redeliver the attached property to the sheriff on demand, provided the sheriff's right to possession has not terminated.

The attaching officer has a right, at any time, to reclaim the attached property,[51] either from his bailee or from defendant, if the bailee has allowed it to go back into the latter's possession,[52] and it is the duty of the bailee or receiptor, on demand, to redeliver to the officer the identical property which he received from him,[53] even though the lien of the attachment has expired.[54] Where, however, the officer's liability is discharged, the bailee need not redeliver to the sheriff, but will be held accountable to the debtor, or his assignee,[55] but the fact that the officer has been absolved from liability is a matter of affirmative defense which the receiptor must establish.[56]

Attaching condition to redelivery A receiptor may not attach a condition to redelivery, and, where he retains possession of the goods because the sheriff declines the conditions imposed, the receiptor is guilty of conversion.[57]

(2) Right to Redeliver

A receiptor has no right to require the sheriff to accept redelivery in the absence of a demand therefor by the sheriff.

One who signs a receipt for goods attached, agreeing to redeliver them to the attaching officer, or his order, on demand, cannot discharge himself by an offer to redeliver them before demand, unless expressly authorized so to do by the terms of his receipt;[58] but in case of a second attachment on the receipted property, he may return the property to the custody of the officer, if he is unwilling to incur any further responsibility by reason of such attachment.[59]

(3) Redelivery to Debtor

A redelivery of the property to the debtor, does not absolve the receiptor from liability to the officer.

When property attached and receipted for is redelivered to the debtor by the receiptor, the latter is liable therefor to the officer, whether by the receipt and redelivery he becomes a bailee and servant of the officer to keep the goods as in the custody of the law, or an original contractor, bound at his peril to have the goods forthcoming according to the terms of the receipt.[60]

d. Conversion.

A receiptor or bailee of attached property may be guilty of conversion of attached property, as where he refuses to redeliver the same on proper demand.

The receiptor or bailee of attached property is liable at any time to be called to account, if guilty of converting the property by any abuse, wrongful use, or refusal to deliver on demand,[61] or where he violates other terms of the bailment;[62] but mere negligence or nonfeasance of the receiptor in respect of the care of the property, whereby it becomes damaged, is not equivalent to a conversion.[63] A bailee has the right to remove the goods to a warehouse, and a removal beyond the jurisdiction of the attaching officer for that purpose does not dissolve the lien or constitute conversion by the bailee.[64]

Where there is a right to redelivery, the owner or his assignee must show a demand for the return of the goods, and a refusal to surrender the same, before the bailee can be held as a converter for nondelivery of the chattel.[65]

§ 300. Release and Discharge of Receiptor

The attaching officer may release the receiptor, but the creditor cannot do so unless he releases his judgment against the debtor. Where the attaching officer is released, this operates to release the liability of the receiptor on his receipt.

As a general rule, anything which will relieve the attaching officer from liability will also release the receiptor from liability on the receipt [66] While the attaching officer may undoubtedly release the receiptor under proper circumstances, it has been held that he cannot do so after he has made an equitable assignment of the receipt to the attaching creditor,[67] and the sheriff cannot release a receiptor to his deputy.[68] The attaching creditor may release the receiptor from liability by releasing his judgment against the debtor; but it has been said that he cannot do so while he retains such judgment, and has taken the necessary steps to perfect his lien under his attachment.[69]

Loss of property without fault Where live stock which has been attached and receipted for dies without the receiptor's fault, before the time limited for its delivery,[70] and, in general, where property has perished without fault of the bailee,[71] he is released from liability.

Dissolution of attachment. The dissolution of the attachment relieves the receiptor of his liability, if the attached property has gone back into the hands of the owner,[72] but not otherwise [73] The mere fact that the prosecution of an attachment suit has been enjoined pending a proceeding in equity does not dissolve the attachment and discharge the sheriff, or defeat his cause of action against the receiptor.[74]

Where an attachment has been dissolved by the insolvency or bankruptcy of the debtor, a receiptor for the attached property is discharged from liability on his undertaking, if the property has gone back into the hands of the debtor, or if he delivers it to the assignee,[75] unless there is an order of court continuing the attachment for the benefit of the latter.[76]

Execution against body of debtor. The liability of a receiptor for goods attached which have not been delivered up by him on seasonable demand is not discharged by the subsequent commitment of the debtor on the execution;[77] but it has been held that if, after demand and before a reasonable time for delivery, the debtor is committed on the execution and no alias is taken out, the receiptor is excused from any delivery on that demand.[78]

Proceedings in main action. A receiptor of attached property is not discharged from liability on his receipt by any proceedings in the action in which the receipt is given, which do not increase his liability or modify, to his prejudice, his contract, as expressed in the receipt [79]

Redelivery of property The redelivery of the receipted property to the officer, on demand, discharges the receiptor from liability.[80]

Subsequent attachment. A receiptor may be discharged by the officer taking the property into his own hands on a second attachment,[81] or, it has been bailee, and the alleged cause of action for conversion was assigned by the debtor, the demand by the assignee for delivery of the goods, without specifying the place of delivery, was too indefinite as a demand, and refusal of such demand could not be sufficiently definite to show a conversion of the goods by a refusal on the part of the bailee to deliver—Titcomb v. held, by the levy of a subsequent attachment and sale on execution, at the instance of plaintiff, or his attorney, after the first attachment.[82]

Act or agreement of parties An agreement between plaintiff and defendant in an action in which the property has been attached and receipted for to the officer by a third person, that plaintiff shall not enforce the receipt until after a specified time, and a forbearance to enforce it accordingly, will not discharge the receiptor from his liability to the officer, where the agreement is made without his consent or authority.[83] However, a sale of attached property by mutual consent of the officer, the attaching creditor, debtor, and receiptor, is an implied rescission of the contract evidenced by the receipt.[84]

Payment of judgment. The payment of the judgment obtained in the action discharges a receiptor from liability on his undertaking.[85]

§ 301. Actions to Protect Possession of Receiptor

As a general rule, a receiptor may sue for an unlawful interference with his possession of receipted goods.

Although it has been held otherwise,[86] the weight of authority is to the effect that a receiptor has such a special property in the goods receipted for by him that he may maintain an action against a person unlawfully interfering with his possession,[87] or that of his agent or servant.[88] Such action may also be brought by the attaching officer.[89]

§ 302. Actions on Receipts

a. Right of action
b. Form of action
c. Demand as condition precedent
d. Defenses
e. Pleading
f. Evidence
g. Damages

a. Right of Action

Generally a right of action on a receipt exists only in favor of the attaching officer, his successors, and assignees.

An action against a receiptor of attached property for failure to redeliver on demand or to pay the stipulated amount should ordinarily be brought by the officer to whom the receipt was given,[90] or in his name for the benefit of the creditor or owner.[91]

Where a receipt is taken by a deputy, he may himself sue,[92] or suit may be brought by his principal.[93] It seems also that a receipt given to a deputy sheriff may be enforced by the succeeding sheriff.[94]

The attaching creditor acquires no such interest in the property as to give him a right of action against the receiptor,[95] although he has been allowed to sue in the name of the attaching officer.[96]

b. Form of Action

Where a receiptor has converted property, the remedy may be in assumpsit on the contract, trover, case, or replevin; but, where the goods are merely injured, trover will not lie.

If the officer's liability for the goods continues, and the bailee refuses to deliver them on demand, or has converted them before demand, he is liable to the officer in assumpsit on his undertaking to keep the goods and deliver them on demand, or in trover for the conversion.[97] It has also been held that an action on the case will also lie against a receiptor for failure to redeliver the attached property,[98] and that an action of replevin can be maintained against a receiptor who becomes a bailee of an officer for attached goods, and who makes himself accountable by contract for the return of them.[99]

Where property is returned, but in a damaged condition, trover will not lie.[1]

c. Demand as Condition Precedent

Where a receipt stipulates for delivery on demand, a demand is a condition precedent to an action on the receipt; but, where the stipulation is in the alternative, to deliver within a specified time, no demand is necessary.

The necessity of a demand on the receiptor for the redelivery of attached property, in order to fix his liability to the officer, is dependent on the terms of the undertaking. Where the contract is simply to return the property on demand, a demand is a condition precedent to a right of action;[2] but, where the promise is in the alternative, to redeliver on demand, or, if no demand is made, to do so within a specified time, usually within the life of the execution that may issue, no demand is necessary after the expiration of such period.[3]

Where the receiptor has put it out of his power to return the property, a demand has been held unnecessary.[4]

On attaching officer. The liability of the receiptor being measured by that of the officer, a failure on the part of the officer holding the execution to make due demand on the attaching officer, whereby he is released from liability, will generally discharge the receiptor; and consequently no action can be maintained in the absence of such demand.[5]

By whom made. A demand on a receiptor for the redelivery of attached property is regularly made by the officer to whom the receipt was given, or by his duly authorized agent,[6] but it may be made by any officer holding the execution and receipt, on showing his authority,[7] and offering to return the receipt on the redelivery of the property.[8]

On whom made. A personal demand should be made on the receiptor himself,[9] or, if he be dead, on his personal representative,[10] although an unsuccessful demand made on the wife of a receiptor, at his dwelling house, during his absence from the state, has been held sufficient to charge him.[11]

In the case of joint receiptors a demand on one will be sufficient to charge all, in an action ex contractu,[12] but not in an action ex delicto.[13]

Time of making. A demand may be made on a receiptor for the return of attached property at any time within the life of the attachment lien. If not made within the statutory time within which execution must issue in order to preserve the lien, the officer has no further right to demand possession, and the receiptor is discharged on the return of the property into the hands of the owner.[14] Where the complaint, on an officer's receipt for attached property, alleged a demand made during the continuance of the attachment lien, it was held that whether the demand was made before or after rendition of judgment in the attachment suit was only material on the question of damages.[15]

Place of making. The demand need not of necessity be made at the place where the property must be received, and any facts which show a demand to be reasonable prove that it was made at a proper place.[16]

The receiptor's dwelling house has been held to be the proper place at which to make demand,[17] and, if it is made elsewhere, he is entitled to a reasonable time within which to make delivery.[18]

Sufficiency. The legal construction of a contract to deliver property on demand is that a reasonable demand is to be made.[19] A "legal demand" in this connection means a demand properly made as to form, time, and place, by a person lawfully authorized, and may be made before or after judgment in the suit in which the property has been attached.[20]

d. Defenses

In general, a defense to an action on the receipt must consist in matter which terminates the right of the sheriff to possession of the attached property.

As a general rule, a receiptor to an officer in attachment can avoid liability only by showing that the officer is free of all liability to the debtor or owner of the property, as well as to the attaching creditor.[21] The amendment of the writ on which property has been attached is not a defense in an action against the receiptor for such property, unless it has the effect of increasing his liability.[22] It is no defense that the receiptor was the attaching creditor, and that the goods have been applied to the debt.[23]

Death of debtor. Unless his estate has been represented insolvent in the probate court, the death of the debtor more than thirty days after judgment in the suit in which the attachment was made is no defense to an action brought by an attaching officer against a receiptor on his receipt for the attached property.[24]

Denial of attachment and receipt of goods The receiptor of attached property is estopped by his receipt to set up in defense to an action against him on his undertaking the insufficiency of the attachment,[25] irregularities in the attachment proceedings,[26] or to deny his receipt of all the goods set forth in the contract[27]

Error in names of parties. It is no defense to an action by an officer on a receipt given to him for property attached that the name of one of the parties was miscalled in the receipt, where it appears that the error was due to the carelessness of the receiptor.[28]

Excessive levy. It is no defense to an action by an officer on a receipt that he has attached property to an amount greater than the writ directed.[29]

Exemption of property. The fact that the property receipted for was exempt from attachment is no defense in an action on the receipt,[30] unless the debtor's possession has not been disturbed, or the property has been returned to his hands[31]

Failure to levy execution. Where the levy of an execution on attached property has been prevented by the refusal of the receiptor to deliver up the property, he is estopped to set up such omission as a defense to his liability on the receipt[32]

Fraud on receiptor. Actual fraud practiced on a receiptor of attached property is a good defense to an action on his receipt.[33]

Insufficiency of return. In an action against the receiptor for the value of goods attached on mesne process he cannot defend on the ground of the insufficiency of the officer's return as to the description of the property attached.[34]

Invalidity of judgment. The receiptors of property attached cannot, as a rule, impeach the judgment rendered in the suit against attachment defendant.[35]

Lack of qualification of officer. It is no defense to an action on a receipt to show that the attaching officer was not properly qualified, unless it appears that the suit is prosecuted solely for his benefit, and not for the benefit of the creditor in the suit on which the attachment was made.[36]

Set-off of debtor against creditor. It is no defense in an action on a receipt for attached goods that defendant in the attachment suit has recovered judgment against the attachment creditor sufficient to satisfy the claim on which the goods were attached.[37]

Tender. Where a specific valuation is affixed to each article attached, the tender of the agreed amount by the receiptor is a good defense to an action on his receipt[38]

e. Pleading

The pleadings should allege an existing attachment, a demand for delivery of receipted goods, and refusal to deliver the same.

should contain sufficient averments to show the attachment, the preservation of the attachment lien, and a sufficient demand on the receiptor, where such demand is necessary to fix his liability, together with his neglect or refusal to redeliver the property.[39] It is not necessary to allege that the officer who served the original writ was therein commanded to attach any certain amount,[40] or that judgment or execution had been obtained against attachment defendant,[41] neither is it necessary that the complaint should negative matters of defense.[42]

Where, in an action on an officer's receipt for property levied on, signed by defendant in his individual capacity, defendant pleaded that before he signed the receipt it was agreed between him and the officer that he should sign in his capacity as director of the corporation, and not otherwise, and that plaintiff would hold defendant liable only as a director, this was insufficient to raise the issue that defendant's signature to the receipt was obtained by fraud.[43]

f. Evidence

The plaintiff must prove the receipt and a violation of the terms thereof, subject to general rules as to the admissibility and sufficiency of evidence.

Plaintiff's right to recover must depend on the tenor of the receipt, and, therefore, where the receipt is lost, and its contents are not shown, judgment must be rendered for defendant.[44] Where live stock attached has died while in the custody of the receiptor, the burden is on plaintiff, in an action on the receipt, to show that this was due to some negligence or misfeasance on the part of the receiptor.[45]

Where the receiptor defends on the ground that the property did not belong to defendant in attachment, the burden is on him to show that such is the case.[46]

Admissibility. Defendant cannot, by parol evidence, alter or vary the terms of a written receipt,[47] but he may introduce evidence to show a release from liability.[48] The return of the officer on the execution issued on the judgment recovered in the suit in which the attachment was made is admissible in evidence to show the timely issue of the execution and an attempted levy on the property.[49]

The attachment debtor is a competent witness to show a sale by him to the receiptor previous to the attachment.[50]

Sufficiency. In an action by an officer against the bailees or receiptors of property attached by him, it is not necessary, in order to prove the attachment, to produce the original writ; but the fact may be proved by other evidence, and the receipt itself, if one has been taken, is the appropriate and proper evidence.[51]

The officer's return on the execution, that he seasonably made a demand on the receiptor, is not an act required in the course of his official duty, and, therefore, is not evidence of a demand,[52] but the written acknowledgment of a receiptor on the receipt, admitting a demand on a certain date, is sufficient evidence thereof,[53] although it does not establish the continuance of the lien on the property, or that the demand was made within the proper time after the rendition of the judgment.[54]

A prima facie case for plaintiff is made out by proof of the receiptor's refusal to deliver the property on demand.[55]

g. Damages

Damages for failure to redeliver are measured by the value of the goods receipted for, or the sum stipulated in the receipt, not exceeding the amount for which the officer is liable.

The measure of damages in an action on a receipt is the value of the goods receipted for, or the stipulated sum agreed to be paid in case of default,[56] not exceeding the amount for which the officer is liable to the attaching creditor.[57] The attaching officer may recover from the receiptor of the attached property only the value of the lien interest as damages, and, when it may be shown that the interest has no value, no loss has been sustained.[58]

When the receiptor allows the property attached to remain in the possession of the debtor, the ordinary rule of damages in an action by the officer is the amount of the judgment and interest, and his fees and poundage, if the value of the property exceeds that amount; but, if the value of the property stated in the receipt is less than the amount of the judgment, the costs, and fees, then the rule of damages is the value of the property as fixed in the receipt.[59] Where, however, the action is still pending against the debtor, on the refusal of the receiptor to deliver the property attached, the officer may recover of him the full value of the property with interest from the time of demand made.[60]

Where part of goods seized under superior title. In New Hampshire, where a part of the goods has been seized by one having a superior claim thereto, the measure of damages in an action against the receiptor for failure to return the balance of the attached goods is the difference between the value of those taken by him claiming the superior title and the value stated in the receipt, without regard to the actual value of the goods withheld by the receiptor;[61] but, where the goods retained by the receiptor, being the property of the debtor, are worth more than the sum stated in the receipt, and the debt secured by the attachment is greater than the same sum, that sum is the measure of damages for the receiptor's neglect to redeliver the debtor's property to the sheriff on demand.[62]

In Vermont, in such a case, damages are to be determined by assuming the value of the whole property receipted to be the same specified in the receipt, and ascertaining the just proportion, at that assumed value, which the property retained by the receiptor would bear to the property for which he is not liable.[63]

Interest is recoverable from the time of demand.[64]

Nominal damages. If there was a good cause of action against a receiptor at the time of the commencement of a suit on his receipt, but this is lost by a failure to preserve the attachment lien, by judgment for defendant and a return of the goods to him, or by reason of a seizure of the goods under a paramount title, nominal damages may nevertheless be recovered.[65]

D. RELEASE ON SECURITY

§ 303. Discretion of Officer Independent of Statute

In the absence of statute, the attaching officer may surrender attached property on such security as he deems sufficient.

Independently of statutory authority it is held that an attaching officer may, in his discretion, release attached property on such security as he may deem sufficient.[66]

§ 304. Special Bail

The discharge of the attachment by a forthcoming or dissolution bond has largely taken the place of the discharge by appearance and entry of special bail under the early practice by which attachment was resorted to to enforce appearance.

When the practice of requiring special bail was in vogue, defendant might discharge an attachment by appearing and entering special bail to the action,[67] the office of process of attachment being to enforce defendant's appearance, for which purpose defendant was required to surrender himself into custody or file special bail.[68] The modern statutes governing attachments do not, however, contemplate the mere enforcement of appearance, and special bail and imprisonment for debt are now generally abolished; but the release of attached

Where the holder of a chattel mortgage paid money to a sheriff, representing defendant, to release an attachment, with the understanding that she could consult her attorney thereafter, and have the money returned to her, if she so desired, in which event the sheriff would retake possession of the goods under the writ of attachment, she is entitled to a return of the money on her prompt consultation with her attorneys and demand and notice to the sheriff to retake possession—Reed v National Grocery Co, 238 P 990, 136 Wash. 7.

property, and the dissolution and discharge of the attachment, are effected by statutory bonds, substituted for special bail.[69]

§ 305. Forthcoming, Replevy, or Dissolution Bond

The defendant in an attachment suit may, under statutory provisions, ordinarily secure possession of his property by executing a forthcoming or a dissolution bond

Where, as has been seen in section 2 of this Title, the purpose of an attachment is to preserve the property in order that it may be applied in satisfaction of any judgment which plaintiff may recover, defendant may, where the statute so provides, secure its release or the release of the property by giving a bond or undertaking in accordance with the statutory requirements.[70] Such statutory bonds or undertakings are of two general classes, those the effect of which is to discharge the lien of the attachment and which, as will be seen in section 313, take the place of the attachment lien and are conditioned for and bind the obligor to the payment of the judgment which may be recovered against defendant in the action, and those which take the place of the property itself and are conditioned for the forthcoming of the property to respond to the judgment or for the payment of the penalty of the bond which is discharged by the satisfaction of such judgment or by the payment of the value of the property.[71] Bonds of the first class are variously termed bail bonds, replevy bonds, discharge bonds, or dissolution bonds, the latter being the designation which will be employed in this Title, while bonds of the second class are ordinarily termed forthcoming or delivery bonds. Such a bond or undertaking is, as will be seen in section 313 and subject to limitations and qualifications there stated, a substitute for the attachment, and is a condition precedent to the restitution of attached property,[72] unless the attachment is invalid or not properly sued out,[73] although it is not affected by all the contingencies which might discharge the attachment itself.[74]

Under statutes where defendant has a right to furnish a forthcoming or dissolution bond, it is the duty of the court or sheriff to accept a proper bond.[75]

A privilege of defendant. The right to give the bond provided for and thus release his property is a privilege conferred, and not a duty enjoined, on 6 C.J. p. 327 note 12.

Bond to pay judgment not forthcoming bond

A bond given by defendant in attachment to pay any money judgment entered against defendant was not a forthcoming or redelivery bond, since a forthcoming bond would have served merely in lieu of the sheriff's physical custody of the property until the question of the propriety of the attachment could have been determined, whereas the bond to pay the judgment waived all questions as to the legality of the attachment, discharged it, and assumed a liability bearing no relation to the property attached.—Toelle v. Sells-Floto Shows Co., 207 P. 849, 111 Kan. 562.

Substitute and discharge bonds

A bond given before appearance of defendant in an action to foreclose a lien on property to secure release thereof after seizure is a "substitute bond," under Comp.L.(1913) § 7542, rather than a "discharge bond," under § 7556, both such statutes being applicable to proceedings to foreclose liens on personal property, under § 8142.—Minneapolis Threshing Mach. Where plaintiff failed to give attachment bond, defendant need not give a forthcoming bond to secure the return of his property.—Foster v. Pettus, 123 S.E. 529, 139 Va. 91.—Foster v. Wilson, 123 S.E. 527, 139 Va. 82.

Exclusiveness of remedy

Defendant could not have attachment in a civil action dissolved without giving bond with sufficient sureties approved in the manner provided by statute, except for irregularities or failure to serve summons, prior to enactment of statute providing for dissolution of attachment on giving bond, approved by plaintiff or certain officials, for payment of amount recovered or value of property released.—Lipsitt v. Statutory construction

In accordance with the general rule of statutory construction that a power conferred on an officer in terms permissive will be construed as mandatory, where the rights of the public or of third persons are involved, it seems that a statute providing that the proper officer "may" take a dissolution bond will be construed as mandatory, and the officer must accept a proper bond.—Capobinco v. Samorak, 128 A. 643, 102 Conn. 310—6 C.J. p. 339 note 95 [b].

defendant, for which reason plaintiff cannot complain that no bond has been given.[76]

For whole or part of property. It has been held that defendant may give a redelivery bond for either the whole or a part of the property attached,[77] and, where defendant tenders a proper additional bond after there has been a partial release on a former bond, the bond must be accepted and the remaining property released.[78]

Where there are two or more actions in which property has been attached, the proper course is to give a bond in each action rather than a single bond with reference to both actions,[79] but it has been held that, where attachments were levied and a single bond given to replevy the property, judgment could be rendered against defendant and his sureties for the amount of the judgment in each case.[80]

Substitution of bond for money. Where money has been deposited with the sheriff or in court under a stipulation, it cannot be released or withdrawn and a bond substituted therefor.[81]

Bond for real estate. A bond which contemplates restoration of possession cannot be taken to release an attachment on real estate, because defendant does not lose possession of real estate by an attachment,[82] although, of course, a dissolution bond, as distinguished from a restitution bond, is acceptable for this purpose.[83]

New or additional bond. Under statutory authorization, when the bond is or becomes insufficient for any reason, the court may order a new or additional bond on the application of plaintiff,[84] and, if defendant or replevinor fails to comply with such order, the court must render judgment for plaintiff by default.[85] The mere fact that the clerk failed to sign the order which was made by the court and assented to by counsel as to the form of the bond cannot affect the validity of such order.[86]

If a bond is canceled and the execution of another bond is ordered, the sureties on the latter are liable, without reference to the former.[87]

Construction of statutes. Where a statute providing for delivery bonds is specific and mandatory, it must be strictly construed.[88]

Cash deposit. Where property is released on a cash deposit in lieu of a bond, one who delivers cash to be used by the debtor for such purpose cannot, as against the seizing creditor, claim ownership of it and, where the property released is not produced, the seizing creditor may execute his judgment against the cash without regard to any such claim.[89]

§ 306. —— Consideration

The release of property, or of the attachment, is ordinarily the consideration of a bond to redeliver the property, or to pay the judgment.

The release of the attached property or of the attachment, as the case may be, has been held to constitute a sufficient consideration for an undertaking or bond executed to obtain such release;[90]

When "may" means "shall"

Under a statute providing that the court in action in which a bond has been given "may" on application of either party order a new bond substituted, and if such substitution be not complied with, "may" render judgment in plaintiff's favor by default, the court has no discretion on granting of plaintiff's application for substitution of new bond in the attachment suit, but must render judgment for plaintiff by default on failure of defendants to make a substitution required, in accordance with the general rule of statutory construction that a power conferred on the court for the benefit of third persons or the public must be construed as mandatory rather than permissive.—Capobinco v. 6 C.J. p. 329 note 21

An additional obligation in the statutory form of a bond is unen-

but a bond given for the release of attached property will be regarded as invalid where there is no valid attachment pending, since in such case it must be regarded as being without consideration,[91] and further, where the attached property has been released on the giving of a bond to pay the judgment, a second bond for the same purpose is without consideration where the first is valid and not discharged.[92]

Where it is sought to give a bond effect as a common-law obligation, there must be a valid consideration therefor, and a consideration that the sheriff will release the lien where he has only authority to surrender the property is invalid.[93]

A seal will not import consideration where the bond was executed under a mistake of fact as to the existence of an attachment.[94]

Bond to prevent attachment. A sheriff's act in refraining from levying under an attachment writ is sufficient consideration for a bond to prevent the attachment.[95]

§ 307. —— Time for Giving

Ordinarily a redelivery or dissolution bond may be given at any time before judgment

Ordinarily the discharge of the property may be obtained by giving the bond at any time before judgment,[96] but after final judgment has been rendered in the action it is too late in the absence of express statutory authorization to obtain a release of the property in this manner.[97] After a sale of the property attached a release of the proceeds may be obtained by giving bond,[98] unless, as has been stated in section 305, the proceeds have been deposited under a stipulation of parties.

A statutory requirement for delivery of a bond within a certain time does not prevent its becoming effective on subsequent delivery as a common-law obligation.[99]

§ 308. —— By and to Whom Given in General

The bond should be given by the person authorized by statute, ordinarily the defendant or his agent or attorney, to the person prescribed by statute, ordinarily the attaching officer or the plaintiff.

The release of property may be secured by the giving of the statutory bond by the attachment defendant,[1] his agent or attorney,[2] or even, it has

Want of jurisdiction

In connection with stay bond

Under Code Civ Proc § 688, as amended by L (1906) c 508, as to an undertaking to be given on application to discharge attachment (which application under section 687, as amended at the same time by chapter 507, may be made any time after defendant has appeared, whereas previously it could be made only before judgment), if application is after judgment for plaintiff, the same undertaking must be given as is required where application is before judgment, and in addition the security to perfect an appeal to the court of appeals and to stay execution, this in view of section 1311, providing that, where the security given on an appeal from final judgment is equal to that required to perfect an appeal to the court of appeals and to stay execution, the court may order discharge of a levy of execution, "but this section does not authorize the discharge of a levy . . . of attachment"—Hadjopoulos v. been held, by a stranger to the attachment.[3] If, however, a person who is not authorized by law or by the court to do so undertakes to execute a delivery bond, it is invalid and will not be sustained either as a statutory or common-law obligation.[4]

Whether the officer levying an attachment or plaintiff in attachment should be named as the obligee in a bond to discharge the attachment, or to have the property forthcoming, depends entirely upon the statute. The bond must conform to the statutory requirement in this regard, else it will be bad as a statutory bond, notwithstanding if voluntarily entered into it may be good as a common-law undertaking.[5] A requirement of the statute that the bond shall run to the successors of the attaching officer must be observed.[6]

A bond running to a deceased person, or to him "and" his executors, administrators, and assigns is void ab initio for want of an obligee, but where the bond runs to such deceased person "or" his executors, administrators, and assigns, there is an existent obligee and the bond is valid.[7]

§ 309. —— Sureties

The surety must qualify according to statute.

The sureties must possess the qualifications required by the statute,[8] but it has been held that a judge might excuse compliance with a rule of court requiring a bond to be acknowledged by the sureties.[9] Where the statute requires the bond to be executed by such sureties as may be approved by the officer, a bond executed by one surety is sufficient.[10]

An undertaking signed by the surety alone has been held to be an act of defendant under the statute requiring defendant to give an undertaking for the discharge of the attachment.[11]

Justification. It is frequently required by statute that the sureties justify before the court, clerk, or sheriff,[12] but in some jurisdictions this requirement, being for the protection of plaintiff and not affecting the validity of the contract therein contained, may be waived.[13]

Objection as to number of sureties. As a provision of the statute requiring a certain number of sureties is for the benefit of plaintiff only, neither defendant nor the sureties will be heard to question the validity of the bond on the ground that it is executed by a less number of sureties than the law requires.[14]

Substitution or addition of sureties. It has been held that for the purpose of substitution courts of general jurisdiction have complete power to require a change of sureties in a delivery bond,[15] and the court may compel defendant to furnish further sureties upon a bond to discharge the attachment.[16]

Release. Statutory provisions for the release and indemnity of sureties on bonds executed in court have been held not applicable to bonds given to procure the release of attachments since the court would have no power to preserve the status quo in case the principal should refuse to give a new bond.[17]

Partners

(1) In some jurisdictions where the interest of one partner in firm property has been attached, the other partner may retain possession by giving a bond to have the property forthcoming—Hardy v Sprowle, 32 Me. 322—Stewart v. Hunter, 1 Handy (Ohio) 22, 12 Ohio Dec (Reprint) 6

§ 310. —— Form and Sufficiency

The bond or undertaking should be in statutory form, but a substantial compliance with the statutes is sufficient, and a bond insufficient as a statutory bond, but sufficient as a common-law bond, may be enforced if it does not contravene public policy.

In order to be sufficient the bond must comply, at least substantially, with the requirements of the statute pursuant to the terms of which it is given,[18] failing in which it is ineffective for the purpose of releasing the property or discharging the attachment, and is incapable of enforcement as a statutory bond.[19]

A voluntary obligation for the release of attached property, however, is a valid common-law obligation,[20] and, although an undertaking may be defective as a statutory bond or for the purposes of the statutory remedy, yet if voluntarily entered into and supported by sufficient consideration it is good as a common-law obligation and may be enforced as such,[21] provided, of course, it does not

Bond under agreement of parties

An undertaking given by agreement of parties reciting that it was given for the release of property attached in a former action and running directly to plaintiff in that action, its maker, defendant, agreeing that it would on demand pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment might be recovered in that action, is not a statutory undertaking for the release of attached property, but is a direct undertaking to plaintiff to pay whatever judgment was obtained by him in the former action —Lane Mortgage Co v U. Bond held not indefinite

The condition of a forthcoming bond for payment of any amount adjudged in plaintiff's favor "on or before the 17th day of December, 1921," was not so indefinite as to invalidate the bond, in view of circumstances indicating that the quoted words were inserted solely because the attachment suit was set for a hearing, and defendants had agreed to try case, on such day —Nations v Beard, 267 S W. 19, 216 Mo.App. 33

Bond without consideration

(1) A bond to dissolve an attachment was not enforceable as a common-law obligation, where no attachment was made of disputed real estate, since the obligor did not receive the benefit of a dissolution of the attachment thereon for which he bargained —American Agr Chemical Co v Ætna Casualty & Surety Co., (Mass) 193 N E 367

(2) Where a bond is on consideration of a release from the lien of attachment, and is given to the marshal, while only the court or clerk has power to release the lien, the consideration is void and the bond cannot be upheld as a common-law obligation —Belleview v. Wittenberg, 5 Alaska 515.

Conditions broader than required by the statute are valid and will be enforced —Automatic Screw Mach Products Co v. Continental Casualty Co, 202 N W. 681, 186 Wis. 435.

Conflicting conditions

A bond by which the obligors bound themselves to produce the property attached at such time and place as the court might require and, on the other hand, to perform the judgment of the court, constitutes a valid common-law bond —Foster v. Pettus, 123 S E 529, 139 Va 91—Foster v. Wilson, 123 S E. 527, 139 Va. 82

Defective execution

A surety on a forthcoming bond cannot complain that the bond was executed before the clerk of court instead of the sheriff, as required by law where the bond was executed pursuant to an order of the court, while the property was in the possession of the sheriff, thus releasing the attached property and rendering the bond a valid common-law obligation, if not a statutory bond —Fidelity & Casualty Co of New York v. Carson, 266 S W. 1063, 206 Ky 136

Deficiency in amount

Under a statute requiring a replevy bond in an amount either double the value of the property attached or double the amount of the claim, a bond "conditioned to pay the contravene public policy or violate the law.[32]

A substantial requirement with the statute is all that is required of a statutory bond,[23] and an imperfect recital of preliminary facts, the suit being accurately described and the condition stated with substantial accuracy, or a mere clerical mistake, as by the transposition or substitution of the names of the parties, will not invalidate it;[24] neither will surplusage defeat the effect of the instrument as a statutory bond,[25] and, as discussed in section 317, a maker whose defective bond has been accepted will be estopped to deny its validity.

The bond must express the condition required by the statute;[26] but it has been held that no consideration need be inserted therein,[27] nor need matters admitted by the execution of the bond be recited.[28] The bond need not be under seal,[29] and in the absence of statute a revenue stamp is not required.[30]

The names of the signers should appear in the bond or some language should be used to indicate that the persons signing intend to become bound.[31]

In some jurisdictions it seems that a forthcoming bond should be executed in the presence of the sheriff, and, if executed before anyone else, it is not a statutory bond.[32]

Signature by agent. Where a bond was signed by an agent who could read and write, on behalf of, and in the presence of, the obligor, who could not read or write, the bond is binding without regard to the question whether the obligor understood the nature of the instrument.[33]

Delivery. The bond must be delivered as the statute may require to the sheriff or officer attaching the property,[34] or, if the writ has been returned to court, the bond must be delivered to the clerk,[35] otherwise it will not be effective. Where the bond was filed with the clerk or delivered to plaintiff instead of the sheriff and the sheriff released the property, the bond may be treated as properly delivered.[36]

Not a common-law bond

The fact that a bond given to release an attachment was delivered to plaintiff instead of the sheriff, did not make it a common law, instead of a statutory, undertaking—Passow & Sons v United States Fidelity & Guaranty Co, 170 P. 1124, 177 Cal. 31

Delivery may depend on intention

Whether a bond given to plaintiff to release an attachment is delivered is a question of intention, which must be that the instrument shall be operative—Jones v. Leslie, 32 P (2d) 443, 138 Cal App 466.

Sufficient delivery

A statutory bond given to release an attachment, where properly executed, approved by the court, filed in the action, and acted upon by the sheriff, is substantially delivered and operative as a statutory bond, although not physically delivered to the sheriff—Jones v Leslie, 32 P. (2d) 443, 138 Cal App 466.

A surety who delivers a bond to the principal with his signature may be found to have authorized the principal to deliver the completed instrument.[37]

Filling blanks. Where a bond is signed by a surety with portions thereof not filled in, and the bond is given to an agent for the obvious purpose of delivery as a valid instrument, the surety is estopped, as to the obligee, to deny the authority of the agent to fill in and deliver the instrument.[38]

Time for objection. An objection to the sufficiency of a replevy bond, made for the first time on a motion for a new trial as to the right of property, comes too late.[39]

Amendment. A defective bond may, it has been held, be amended so that it will conform to the statute.[40]

§ 311. —— Amount

The penalty of the bond or undertaking is usually based on the value of the property or the amount of the claim.

The penalty of the bond usually under the statute must be proportioned to the value of the property,[41] or the amount of the claim sued on,[42] or the ad damnum of the writ.[43]

Where plaintiff sues several defendants, for one cause of action under a statute permitting such course of action where he is in doubt as to the person legally liable, a dissolution bond may be for amount of the claim, executed by all defendants, rather than several times the claim according to the number of defendants, and such bond will release the property of all the defendants levied on to secure the claim.[44]

§ 312. —— Approval of Bond and Order of Discharge

The bond must be approved by the court, clerk, or officer, and an order of discharge obtained as the statute may require.

A redelivery or dissolution bond should be approved by the sheriff, clerk, or judge where so required by statute.[45] If it is not so approved, it is not a statutory bond,[46] although the obligors may bind themselves by entering into a voluntary undertaking, without the procurement of a discharge by order of court,[47] and they may be bound as at common law in the absence of approval, as required by statute.[48]

Amount fixed by sheriff

(1) A forthcoming bond must be in an amount double the value of the property released, which value is fixed by the sheriff—Campbell v. Tucker, 154 So. 825, 228 Ala 658, denying certiorari (App.) 154 So. 821.

(2) The attaching officer is not required to estimate the value of the attached property until defendants elect to have the replevy bond cover the value of the property rather than the amount of plaintiff's debt —Ford v Marsden, (Tex Civ.App) 54 S W.(2d) 833.

Presumption

Where the bond is not in double the amount of the claim, it will be presumed to be for double the value of the property seized, and that the officer fixed the value as he is authorized to do—Sadler v Murphy, (Tenn App) 77 S W.(2d) 70—Johnson v Phillips, 4 Tenn Civ App 662

Presumption as to election

In Texas, in the absence of a showing that defendants in attachment elected to make a bond covering value of property replevied, the court will presume that the bond was for double the amount of the debt—Ford v Marsden, (Tex Civ.App) 54 S W (2d) 833—Calvert v Bennett, (Tex Civ App) 286 S W 303

Attachment of indivisible property

The right of an officer to attach a single indivisible article of personal property, like a vessel, although of much greater value than the amount he is directed to attach on his precept, must be sustained of necessity where no other or sufficient property to satisfy his precept can be found, or is shown to him by the debtor, but such an attachment of course creates a lien only to the amount required to be attached under the precept, and can be released by a bond in the penal sum of the ad damnum of the writ—Devereux Co v. Implied approval

"It is argued that the bond was not accepted and approved by the sheriff, and is therefore void. This was not formally done, but the facts that the plaintiff, who stood back of the sheriff and for whom the sheriff was acting, was satisfied with it, and the sheriff yielded possession of the property on account of its execution and delivery, are sufficient, we think, to establish an actual approval"—Commercial Nat Bank of Kearney v. 6 C J p 334 note 67.

Where the statute requires approval by the sheriff, the court cannot pass on its validity so as to bind the sheriff.[49]

Approval need not be indorsed on the bond, but the fact that the bond is accepted and spread on the docket without objection is sufficient proof of approval.[50]

Approval by officer having interest. Where a bond is accepted by the sheriff who is plaintiff in the suit, the bond is valid as against the contention that this is against the statute providing that he may not execute process in his own case.[51]

Waiver of approval. Where approval is regarded as a step for the protection of plaintiff, it may be waived, and the obligation remains a statutory bond.[52]

Order for discharge or release. The sheriff may release the attachment without a court order where he has not returned the writ to court.[53] Moreover, where the writ directs the officer to accept security, no order of discharge is required.[54] An order of dissolution should state whether it applies to the whole or only part of the property, and if to a part, what part.[55]

Presumptions. Where the consideration of a bond was the release or discharge of an attachment, and the property has been returned, it will be presumed that the necessary court orders to that end have been made.[56]

§ 313. —— Construction and Effect

a. Construction
b. Effect
c. Rights and remedies of sureties

a. Construction

The rules of construction applicable to bonds generally apply to forthcoming and dissolution bonds.

Recitals in a statutory undertaking, conditioned for the redelivery of attached property, have the same effect and ought to be construed in the same way as bonds containing similar recitals, and are to be given the same construction as other writings obligatory.[57] Although a bond is not strictly an undertaking such as is contemplated by the statute, in an action on the bond it will be construed in the same manner as a bond under the statute, and will be read in the light thereof and interpreted according to the meaning and intention of the parties.[58] It has been held that, where the bond does not follow the statute, and an action is brought thereon, the statutory terms will be read into the bond,[59] but similar provisions of a garnishment statute cannot be read into a bond for restitution of attached property.[60]

Where the bond has been prepared by defendant's counsel without notice to plaintiff or opportunity to suggest its form or object thereto, any doubt or ambiguity should be construed most strongly against defendant.[61]

Bond approved by wrong person

A bond to discharge an attachment duly executed and approved by a sheriff will be held good as a common-law bond, although it is not approved by the court, if it does not contravene public policy or violate the law —National Surety Co v. Morand, 217 P 870, 92 Okl. 60.

b. Effect

(1) On lien of attachment
(2) On right to question or attack attachment
(3) On right to proceed to judgment
(4) On right to possession
(5) On right to deny ownership or liability to seizure
(6) On liability to subsequent levies

(1) On Lien of Attachment

(a) Forthcoming bond
(b) Dissolution bond

(a) Forthcoming Bond

The giving of a forthcoming bond does not dissolve the attachment.

A bond conditioned for the forthcoming or delivery of the property to satisfy any judgment that may be rendered does not affect or discharge the attachment,[63] or withdraw the property from the custody of the law so as to destroy the lien of the attachment, but the lien is preserved as if the property remained in the care of the officer[64] until the bond is forfeited.[65] Consequently, where property returned to defendant is subsequently attached, the second levy is subject to the prior levy, and the property may be applied in satisfaction of the judgment in the first action.[66]

The bond serves merely to insure the safe-keeping and faithful return of the property, and substitutes the responsibility of the obligors in this respect for that of the officer.[67] After the execution of such bond, the court cannot appoint a receiver to take charge of and sell the property.[68]

(b) Dissolution Bond

A dissolution bond dissolves the attachment lien.

A bond under the statute for the discharge of an attachment, not merely to have the property forthcoming, but conditioned to perform the judgment which may be rendered, dissolves the attachment and discharges the property from the custody of the law,[69] and after giving such bond the attach-

Bond as standing for property

In the case of a bond given for the dissolution of the attachment, the bond takes the place of the attached property as security for the payment

ment defendant can sell or dispose of the property without violating any legal obligation assumed to the parties concerned in the cause.[70] It has been held, however, under some statutes, that the discharge of the lien of attachment by the giving of a bond to take its place does not vacate the writ of attachment[71]

The annulment of a dissolution bond will not reinstate an attachment lien.[72]

(2) On Right to Question or Attack Attachment

(a) Forthcoming bond
(b) Dissolution bond

(a) Forthcoming Bond

The giving of a forthcoming bond does not prevent the defendant from attacking the attachment, although the parties may not deny the existence of a valid levy.

The giving of a forthcoming bond as a rule does not bar a subsequent motion or other proceeding by defendant or surety to vacate the attachment,[73] although it should be noted that the giving of a forthcoming bond is an admission of the validity of the levy, which estops defendant from attacking the attachment or defending an action on the bond by a denial of such levy,[74] and, further, some authorities announce broadly that the obligors in the bond are estopped to deny the regularity or sufficiency of the attachment.[75]

Where the bond does not release the property without an order of discharge, the giving of the bond does not preclude defendant from moving to dismiss the attachment,[76] and a bond does not of plaintiff's claim—Ravely v Isensee, 221 N W 38, 57 N D 286

Bond for real estate

Where a replevy bond has been given to secure the release of real estate, this will not affect the right to foreclose the attachment lien, because the bond cannot be accepted to release real estate—Toland v Stroud, (Tex Civ App) 36 S W.(2d) 769.

Change in nature of action

Principal and surety on an attachment bond are not liable to defendant in attachment, where there was no legal seizure of property of defendant in attachment, either by levy or by garnishment, and attachment was dissolved by filing of dissolution bond prior to answer of garnishee and of defendant in attachment, whereafter the case proceeded as an ordinary suit at law—Dunn & McCarthy v Pinkston, (Ga App) 187 S E 175

In New York

(1) The supreme court has held that defendant's giving of a forthcoming bond does not preclude a subsequent motion to vacate an attachment for insufficiency of plaintiff's affidavit—Shapiro v Loft, Inc, 254 N Y S 197, 142 Misc. 144.

(2) The city courts, however, have held that the condition of a release bond that defendant will deliver the property to satisfy the execution constitutes an admission that the warrant of attachment issued regularly, provided the summons was personally served, and that a motion to vacate the warrant, on the ground that the facts shown in the papers do not justify an attachment, will not lie—Erlich v Bristol, 262 N.Y. S 340, 341, 146 Misc. 831

(3) Discussing the effect of the statutory condition in a release bond given under the Justice's Court Act, it was stated, "in other words, the defendant says, in effect, 'You let me have my property, and if you recover judgment, I will pay the judgment up to the amount of the sum specified in the undertaking, if I don't return the property' . . . Because of the provisions of the Justice's Court Act relative to warrants of attachment and the view here expressed, it would seem that the motion to vacate the attachment becomes an academic question"—Erlich v Bristol, supra

Bond to prevent attachment

Property subject to mortgage

Where property subject to a mortgage was attached and released on a dissolution bond, the fact that the levy may have been void is no defense where the principal ignored other remedies and gave the dissolution bond—Truax v Title Guaranty & Surety Co., 162 P 586, 94 Wash 472.

preclude defendant from traversing the truth of the grounds of attachment,[77] or from moving to dismiss the attachment.[78]

Mistake. It would seem that a mutual mistake of fact as to the actual levy may be shown, for in such case there is a failure of consideration.[79]

(b) Dissolution Bond

The giving of a dissolution bond ordinarily prevents the defendant from attacking the validity of the attachment, although it has been held by some authorities not to preclude the assertion of its wrongfulness, or a demand for additional security.

Where defendant gives a dissolution or discharge bond, or a bond conditioned to perform the judgment, which operates to discharge the attachment altogether, and makes the obligors unconditionally liable, this would seem to render immaterial the validity or even the existence of the grounds on which the attachment was based.[80] As to this, however, the authorities are not uniform, and while the decided weight of authority is in support of the view that the giving of such a bond operates as a waiver on the part of the attachment defendant to move for a dissolution of the attachment thereafter, and estops him to deny the truth or sufficiency of the grounds on which it was issued or the regularity of the proceedings,[81] the courts of a number of states adhere to the view that defendant may proceed to vacate the attachment notwithstanding the giving of such bond.[82] However, conceding that the attachment defendant is estopped to assert matters making the attachment merely voidable, the rule cannot be extended so as to estop defendant from showing that the proceedings are absolutely void, where to do that would confer jurisdiction upon a court having none.[83]

Effect of plaintiff's forbearance to attach

Where no attachment of certain of defendant's real estate was made by the officer who attached other real estate, and plaintiffs' attorneys were not led to assume that the bond to dissolve attachment was furnished to avoid a threatened or impending attachment, plaintiffs' forbearance or failure to make a new attachment did not estop the surety to deny that an attachment was made on the theory that any mistake made was its mistake only or on the theory that the recitals in the bond induced the mistake on the part of plaintiffs.—American Agr. Chemical Co. v. Ætna Casualty & Surety Co., (Mass.) 193 N.E. 367

Dissolution bond is absolute undertaking

A bond given for the release of attached property, conditioned for payment of any judgment recovered against defendant, is not a substitute for the attached property, but is an original unconditional contract of the sureties, which renders it immaterial whether the attachment was valid.—First Nat. General on prayer for specific attachment

Where a general attachment was issued, the obligor on a release bond to perform the judgment could not claim that a specific attachment was prayed for.—Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v. Helm, 289 S.W. 280, 217 Ky. 384

Misjoinder in original bill

A surety could not avoid liability on a bond to dissolve an attachment in an equity suit on the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff in such suit in equity.—Degnan v. Maryland Casualty Co., 171 N.E. 482, 271 Mass. 427

Where an attachment bond unconditionally promised to pay a judgment on the merits, and effected release of the attached property, the parties thereto are estopped from questioning the regularity of the affidavit therefor.—Connor Live Stock Co. v. The giving of an attachment discharge bond does not waive the validity of the statutory ground on which the attachment was based.—Bissell v. Mitchell, 142 S.E. 706, 195 N.C. 484.

Necessity of judgment establishing ground

Some courts take the view that the giving of a dissolution bond will not estop defendant in attachment from maintaining an action on the attachment bond to recover his costs and the damages which he may have sustained by reason of the attachment, if it is finally determined that plaintiff had no cause of action,[84] but, as a general rule, the statutory condition being an unconditional promise to perform the final judgment of the court, the action proceeds as though no attachment had ever issued, and the election to dissolve the attachment estops defendant to claim that it was wrongful[85]

The execution of the statutory bond for the discharge of an attachment does not operate as a waiver of the right to demand additional or increased security from the attachment plaintiff[86]

(3) On Right to Proceed to Judgment

Ordinarily, the giving of a bond to release attached property has no effect on the plaintiff's right to proceed to judgment.

The giving of a bond does not preclude the rendition of a personal judgment against defendant on plaintiff's demand,[87] and, under ordinary circumstances, can have no effect whatever on the right of plaintiff to proceed to judgment in the main action, but under a statute permitting defendant in the attachment, brought for a debt not due, to give a bond conditioned for the payment of the debt at maturity, it has been held that the creditor cannot proceed to judgment after the bond is given[88]

An objection, by a surety on an undertaking given to secure the release of property attached at the commencement of an action, to a second trial of the action, on the grounds that a judgment against defendant, the principal obligor, remains of record and unreversed, and that there is no issue joined between plaintiff and surety, is properly overruled where the effect of vacating the original judgment as to the surety was to vacate it as to defendant.[89]

(4) On Right to Possession

Where the defendant executes a redelivery or dissolution bond, he thereupon becomes entitled to possession of the attached property.

Where defendant in attachment executes and delivers to the attaching officer a bond in conformity to the statute for the release of the property or the discharge of the attachment, he becomes entitled to the possession of the attached property,[90] and it becomes the duty of the attaching officer to deliver such property to him,[91] without prior demand[92]

Where the attachment is discharged by the giving of an undertaking, defendant may be required to pay the fees and charges of the levying officer as a condition of receiving back possession of the property.[93]

money received and conversion was based on contract or tort was not a matter of jurisdiction, but of evidence, as to which the complaint on which the attachment was based was not conclusive on rightfulness of attachment, and it was prima facie valid, and, consequently, the defect constituted no defense—Koehler v Serr, 13 P.(2d) 673, 216 Cal 143, 89 A.L.R 262

Where pleadings show attachment unauthorized

Where the grounds for attachment and other statements in the affidavit are contradicted by recitals in the complaint showing no right to an attachment, and the proceedings have been vacated on motion, such void proceedings may be shown in defense to an action on the undertaking to release the attachment—Kreider v American Surety Co of New York, (Cal.App.) 43 P (2d) 331.

Reasons for estoppel

"By the execution of the bond the defendant waived all objections to the attachment or what had been done under it He put it out of the power of the plaintiff to establish in that action that the attachment was properly obtained But for the giving of the bond the plaintiff might by amendment have asserted other grounds in addition to those he had alleged and might so in the end have sustained the attachment, though the grounds he had alleged, which had been controverted, were not sustained by the evidence . . The trial by the court with the witnesses before it could not be had after the bond was executed, and the right being expressly waived by the execution of the bond now sued on, the defendant cannot be heard to say that the right he then waived may be asserted in this action and is to be determined by the jury on the facts now shown"—Fidelity & Deposit Co of Maryland v Cobb, 281 S.W 478, 479, 213 Ky 467

(5) On Right to Deny Ownership or Liability to Seizure

The obligors on a bond to release attached property cannot, as a rule, deny the liability of the property to attachment or defendant's ownership.

Although there is authority to the contrary,[94] the obligors in a dissolution or redelivery bond cannot, as a rule, show that defendant is not the owner of the attached property,[95] or that it is not subject to levy.[96] However, it has also been held that a bond conditioned to release attached property, to pay any judgment that might be rendered, or to have the property ready to satisfy it was not a recognition of the title of defendants, and could have no force as a ratification of an unauthorized purchase by another.[97]

Assuming that the obligors may show want of ownership, proof of some interest in the property will be sufficient to render them liable on a redelivery bond.[98]

Showing encumbrances Where a bond is given under a statute requiring security conditioned to pay the value of the interest of defendant in the attached property, the obligors may show that defendant's interest was so small that merely nominal damages are recoverable,[99] but where the bond is conditioned to pay the judgment without reference to the value of the property, the existence of encumbrances is immaterial and cannot be shown.[1]

(6) On Liability to Subsequent Levies

The release of the property does not preclude its seizure on other levies, nor prevent the issuance of other attachments

It has been held that the giving of the statutory bond will not bar the issuance of another attachment where it appears that the surety is insolvent and the security insufficient,[2] nor does a bond to release certain property defeat the right to a second attachment in the same suit against other property, where defendant fails to give a bond for the release of his whole estate.[3] Where property has been released on bond, it may be levied on for execution of judgment,[4] and the giving of the bond does not prevent a creditor's motion to pursue the released property for satisfaction of execution in the hands of fraudulent holders of title.[5]

c. Rights and Remedies of Sureties

The surety may recover any amount paid from his principal, and, in some jurisdictions, may intervene to quash the bond or defend the main suit.

on an attachment bond for any amount he is obliged to pay thereunder, and the dismissal of the attachment suit as to one of the principals will not affect his liability to the surety.[6]

In some jurisdictions the sureties may protect their interests by moving to quash the attachment and bond,[7] and by defending the main action.[8] However, in other jurisdictions, they may not intervene and defend the main action,[9] and this is true where summary judgment may be entered against the surety and he is a party only for that purpose.[10] It has been held that a motion to quash a forthcoming bond is not proper or permissible in an action on such bond.[11]

Where an attachment is quashed, the surety may move to have the bond discharged.[12]

The surety's petition to be relieved of a forfeiture need not be brought in equity.[13]

§ 314. —— Effect of Appeal, Supersedeas, or Stay Bond

Ordinarily a bond on appeal cannot take the place of a forthcoming bond.

In the absence of statutory provision it is held that an appeal undertaking cannot be given the force of a forthcoming bond or be permitted otherwise to alter the status of the attached property,[14] the lien of the attachment, or the liability of the obligors on a delivery bond,[15] but, on the other hand, it has also been held that a supersedeas bond, which must be given to secure whatever judgment is rendered in a court of error, is a substitute for plaintiff's security by attachment or by bond given by defendant to dissolve an attachment.[16]

Where the same person is surety on both the delivery bond and the supersedeas bond, he is liable on both bonds,[17] although his total liability cannot exceed the amount for which the principal is in default upon the judgment rendered against him.[18]

§ 315. —— Liability of Obligors

a. Scope and extent
b. Conditions precedent

a. Scope and Extent

The liability of the obligors upon a bond or undertaking given to release attached property is measured by its terms and in case the attachment proceedings are not void may be either for the return of the attached property or the payment of its value or the satisfaction of the judgment against defendant.

The liability of the maker or sureties upon an undertaking or bond given to secure the release of the attached property is measured by the terms of the obligation which they have executed,[19] and where the sureties sign a bond freely and with full opportunity to understand the act, they are bound according to the terms of the bond and cannot show that they did not comprehend the con-

Errors or mistakes as to parties

(1) The surety on a bond to dissolve an attachment, signing under a mistaken belief as to the identity of the principal, is not liable on judgment against defendant other than such principal—Gordon & Dilworth v. Abbott, 154 N.E 523, 258 Mass 35

(2) Where the surety, as attorney for defendant in attachment, drew up the bond to secure the release of the property, which effected its purpose, he is not relieved from liability on the bond because the condition was therein stated to be the payment by defendant of all damages, costs, etc, recovered by defendant against plaintiff, which, in the most charitable view, was merely a clerical error and judgment was in fact recovered against defendant—Aman v Carpenter, 178 N.W 33, 210 Mich 660.

(3) Where a replevy bond was given by a stranger as authorized by statute, but was conditioned as though the stranger were defendant, a judgment for the true defendant shows no breach of the stranger's bond, and as a consequence no liability arises on the bond, either as a statutory or common-law obligation—Donaldson v. Wilkerson, 68 So. 812, 192 Ala. 100.

sequences.[20] So, where a common-law bond is taken, the scope and extent of the undertaking is to be gathered from the intent of the parties thereto as disclosed by a fair import of its language,[21] and the liability of the parties is measured by its terms and not by the terms of the statutory bond.[22]

The liability of the sureties cannot be extended to other actions than that in which the bond is given by a subsequent agreement of the principal[23] or by the action of the court.[24]

Necessity for valid attachment. Where an attachment is void for want of jurisdiction, the bond is also void, and no liability arises thereon,[25] but in a jurisdiction in which the truth of the matters set forth in the affidavit for attachment cannot be put in issue for the purpose of abating the writ, the sureties on a replevy bond cannot complain of a foreclosure of the attachment lien and a judgment against them on the bond on the ground that the facts stated in the affidavit are not true but are protected by the attachment bond.[26]

Bond for return of property. The only undertaking assumed upon a forthcoming bond in its ordinary form is that the property shall be forthcoming or the judgment in attachment shall be satisfied;[27] where the attachment is sustained, it is the duty of the obligors to return the property to the proper officer where a sale of the property is ordered[28] or, upon demand, to restore the property to the attaching officer so that execution can issue thereon,[29] and a cause of action accrues against the surety when, after such judgment, he refuses to deliver the property on demand and the execution is returned unsatisfied.[30] Under such a bond, the sureties are not liable for the payment of a personal judgment against defendant.[31]

Where the condition of the bond is merely that the property shall be forthcoming to answer the judgment, the party giving the bond does not become personally liable for the debt which formed the basis of the suit, but is bound only to produce the property in case judgment in the attachment proceeding is rendered for plaintiff.[32]

Where attached property is replevied with the intention of wasting and converting it, and the sureties on the bond had notice of such intention, they are jointly liable with their principal for the conversion.[33]

Bond for performance or payment of judgment. Where the obligor on the bond to discharge the attachment binds himself that defendant will perform the judgment of the court, he must perform such judgment in case defendant does not do so,[34] and upon judgment in favor of plaintiff the ob-

Bond by one of two defendants

A bond executed to obtain the release of an attachment in an action against two defendants covers only the liability of the defendant named as principal in the bond, and was applicable only to the satisfaction of judgment obtained against such defendant alone or jointly —Massachusetts Bldg Finish Co. v. Brenner, (Mass) 193 N E 355.

Identity of cause of action

The burden undertaken by the surety on an attachment bond, at the time of its execution, was to meet any judgment for the same cause of action relied on by plaintiff when the action was commenced —Massachusetts Bldg Finish Co. v. Brenner, (Mass) 193 N E 355.

Within thirty days

Where the condition is to pay within thirty days after final judgment, recovery may be had where plaintiff held execution without any ligation of the obligor to pay the judgment on demand becomes absolute.[35]

b. Conditions Precedent

(1) In general
(2) Judgment
(3) Execution
(4) Demand

(1) In General

As a condition precedent to liability on the bond or undertaking, there must have been a breach of the condition and it must have effectuated a release of the property or a dissolution of the attachment.

In order that liability may arise against the principal and sureties, there must have been a breach of the conditions of the bond or undertaking.[36]

It has been held that a bond for the release of attached property or the discharge of an attachment does not become operative, and no liability arises thereon, unless or until the attached property is redelivered to the attachment defendant or his agent,[37] but there is also authority for the view that, where the practice under the statute requires an order discharging the attachment upon the execution of the proper bond, if the condition of the undertaking is for the release of the property from the attachment and not from the possession of the officer, the condition is complied with by an order discharging the attachment, and it is immaterial whether or not the property was redelivered to defendant.[38] It is also no objection that the sheriff surrendered the property to a third person, where defendant consented thereto.[39]

(2) Judgment

A final judgment in the attachment proceedings imposing a liability upon the defendant named in the bond either to pay it or to surrender the attached property for its satisfaction is ordinarily essential to liability on either a dissolution or a forthcoming bond.

There must ordinarily be a disposition of the cause requiring payment of judgment, some claim adjusted for the satisfaction of which the property is required, or some order of court under which the production of the property becomes a duty, before liability under a forthcoming or dissolution bond can arise,[40] but the conditions of the bond may be such that a failure to redeliver the property before judgment may subject the obligors to liability.[41] Further, the judgment must have been rendered in the attachment suit; a judgment in another suit upon the same cause of action by the same plaintiff against the same principal debtor is not sufficient.[42] On the other hand, a personal judgment against defendant is not a condition to liability upon a redelivery bond where such a judgment or order is made as requires a production of the property,[43] and further, the surety becomes liable when defendant's liability is established, although judgment has not been rendered against the surety.[44]

Finality. The judgment to secure the performance or satisfaction of which a bond is executed is ordinarily the final judgment under which plaintiff is entitled to be paid or defendant to be discharged.[45] A dissolution bond, conditioned for the payment of final judgment, may be enforced although the final judgment is rendered nunc pro tunc as of a previous term, notwithstanding payment must, under the statute, be made in a limited time after final judgment to avoid a breach since such time did not run until the action against the principal or surety and made no effort to notify them of the execution or to collect it for one year and two months—Marcus v Rice, 172 N E 354, 272 Mass 290

date of entry nunc pro tunc.[46]

Where a bond is conditioned to pay a judgment against the principal, and a claimant has intervened, a final judgment on the merits will fix the surety's liability although the intervening claim has not been adjudicated.[47]

Against or in favor of whom rendered. It is, of course, necessary in order to fix the liability of the obligors in the bond that the judgment rendered in the action should be against the person named in the bond as the one for the satisfaction of a judgment against whom the bond is executed, and a judgment against any other person cannot have this effect.[48] However, it is not necessary that the judgment should in form be against the obligors, even though the bond is conditioned to pay such judgment as shall be rendered in favor of plaintiff against the obligors.[49]

The obligors are liable on a bond for the discharge of an attachment conditioned for the payment of the judgment which may be recovered, although judgment is recovered against less than all of the defendants,[50] and, where the bond is conditioned to pay a judgment entered against defendants individually or jointly, a judgment entered against two of several defendants will render the surety liable.[51]

Where the property of one of two defendants is seized, a dissolution bond, conditioned to pay the final judgment in the action, will render the obligors liable not only for a judgment against both defendants, but for judgment against defendant alone who was not the owner of the property.[52]

Where other creditors may apply under the statute and have their claims adjusted, a bond, although conditioned for the return of the goods should judgment be rendered for plaintiff, is for the benefit of all such creditors and will be construed to refer to any plaintiff who, as applying creditor, has filed a declaration and recovered judgment.[53]

Sustaining attachment. On a bond to pay the debt and costs if judgment should be rendered against defendants, a judgment upon a verdict sustaining allegations of fraud upon which the attachment was based is not an essential prerequisite to a recovery on the bond.[54] Where, however, defendant is given the right to controvert the grounds for attachment notwithstanding the execution of a dissolution bond, the surety cannot be held in the absence of a judgment sustaining the attachment.[55]

The judgment sustaining the attachment need not be made at the time of judgment in the main action, but may be entered at any proper time.[56]

Necessity for order of sale or of return of property. Whether the judgment must involve a decision as to the attached property in order to impose liability on the bond is a question which depends upon the character of the bond and the practice in the particular jurisdiction.[57] In the case of a forthcoming bond which is conditioned to have the property forthcoming or to pay its value to the extent of any judgment which may be rendered, where, under the particular statutes involved, the proper procedure is for the court, upon rendering judgment for plaintiff, to make an order for the delivery of the property to the officer for sale and to make an order for the sale thereof, there is no liability upon the forthcoming bond in the absence of such an order,[58]

Attachment sustained on appeal

Where a separate judgment was rendered dissolving the attachment, and an appeal taken, it was not true that there could be only one judgment in the case, and the judgment on such appeal maintaining the attachment was efficacious although rendered after judgment on the merits—Swift & Co. v Leon Cahn & Co., 92 So 355, 151 La 837

57. Jordan v. Brown Shoe Co, 4 P. (2d) 1020, 152 Okl 288—6 C J. p 342 note 24.

Failure to decree a privilege

A judgment on appeal is sufficient to support an action on a forthcoming bond although it fails to decree for plaintiff a privilege, or order that the property be seized or sold, these being consequences of the maintenance of the attachment—Swift & Co v. Leon Cahn & Co, 92 So. 355, 151 La 837

58. Jordan v. Brown Shoe Co, 4 P. (2d) 1020, 152 Okl. 288—6 C J. p 342 note 25.

particularly where the condition is specifically to return the property if so directed,[59] and a mere personal judgment is held insufficient upon which to predicate the breach.[60] It would seem, however, that the surety upon a forthcoming bond who has agreed that the attached property shall be forthcoming and rendered subject to the order of the court when the litigation reaches a stage for such action may be liable although there is no judgment subjecting the attached property or directing its delivery with which the judgment debtor has failed to comply where the property is outside of the judgment of the court and such an order is impossible of enforcement.[61]

In the case of a dissolution bond, on the other hand, where the bond discharges the attachment, releases the property from the custody of the law, and contains an unconditional obligation to pay whatever judgment may be rendered against defendant, the liability of the sureties is fixed by a simple judgment against defendant,[62] and there is no necessity for a recital that the attachment is affirmed,[63] or an order for a redelivery or sale of the attached property.[64]

Pendency of appeal. Neither a statutory provision requiring an undertaking nor a provision requiring the return of attached property to defendant upon his recovery of a judgment against plaintiff in the absence of the perfection of an appeal by plaintiff and the execution of an undertaking affects the liability of the sureties upon an undertaking or common-law bond given to secure the release of an attachment which is conditioned to pay to plaintiff the amount of any judgment which may be recovered by him in the action.[65] Where a bond given to dissolve an attachment is not sufficient as a statutory bond to preclude the necessity of a recognizance on appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, the surety cannot assert that there is no final judgment permitting a recovery against him on his bond notwithstanding defendant has claimed an appeal where he has failed to comply with an order of the court to furnish an appeal bond.[66]

(3) Execution

In some jurisdictions an action will not lie on a bond to release attached property unless an execution has been issued and returned unsatisfied.

Where plaintiff obtains judgment and execution is issued and returned unsatisfied, the condition of an undertaking to discharge the attachment,[67] or to have the property forthcoming to abide the final order of the court,[68] is broken and the liability of the sureties attaches.

In some jurisdictions under the statutes an execution must be regularly issued and regularly returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, before liability will arise on a dissolution bond.[69] A premature return of an execution will not support the action unless it appears that there was no property on which execution might have been levied.[70] An execution is unnecessary, however, where it cannot be satisfied, as where defendant has been adjudicated a bankrupt,[71] but it has also been held that where a discharge in bankruptcy has not been obtained within one year after adjudication the issue and return unsatisfied of the execution is a condition precedent to enforcement of the liability.[72]

In the absence of statutory requirement, execution and return unsatisfied, made by an officer, is not essential to establish the liability of the sureties on a bond given to discharge the attachment,[73] but where special judgment against property released on a forthcoming bond is required, special execution demanding the sale of the property is necessary.[74]

Where the bond is conditioned to pay the judgment, the liability of the sureties attaches upon the rendition of the judgment against defendant and the issue of execution is not a condition to the right to resort to the bond.[75]

Common-law obligation. The issue and return unsatisfied of an execution is not a condition precedent to the enforcement of a common-law obligation unless the bond specifies such issue and return.[76]

(4) Demand

A demand must be made before an action can be brought on a bond where it so provides or where the statute so requires.

Where the condition of the bond or undertaking is expressed to be for a redelivery of the property upon demand, or where demand is prescribed by statute, such demand is ordinarily necessary to fix the liability of the obligors and give the obligee a right of action upon the bond,[77] but it has been held that no demand for the redelivery of property is necessary where it has been removed from the jurisdiction by an insolvent defendant in the action who has left the jurisdiction,[78] where defendant has been adjudicated a bankrupt,[79] where a bond given to discharge an attachment is conditioned to pay plaintiff the amount of final judgment within thirty days after entry,[80] where the bond makes it the sheriff's duty to make the demand, and plaintiff in attachment sues on the bond,[81] or in any case where a demand would be fruitless [82] Where the undertaking for the release of an attachment is for defendant's payment of the judgment upon demand, the sureties being liable immediately on default of their principal under the statute, without demand or notice, plaintiff may sue them without waiting for the expiration of the day on which payment is demanded of, and refused by, defendant [83]

The issuance of an execution and service by the officer is a sufficient demand.[84]

Where there is more than one surety, and the obligation is joint and several, a demand need be made only of the surety against whom suit is brought.[85]

The sureties upon a bond of the character under consideration may be discharged by satisfaction of its conditions. So, where the bond is for a redelivery of the property, they are discharged by such redelivery,[86] and if it is in the alternative to perform the

Bond without statutory condition

Where a delivery bond given by defendant under a statute was not judgment or to have the property or its value forthcoming it may be satisfied at their option by the performance of either condition.[87]

In the case of a bond given to discharge the attachment conditioned for the payment of the judgment, it may be discharged by such a payment or tender of the proper amount,[88] but it can be discharged only by such payment or tender,[89] and the obligors have no option to return the property in lieu thereof.[90]

Where it is proper to discharge the bond by a redelivery of the property, it must be redelivered in its entirety[91] and in the same condition as when it was surrendered to defendant,[92] free from liens which have been permitted to attach by its release.[93] However, where a forthcoming bond is given to prevent a levy, and part of the goods were then so affixed to the realty that they could not be severed, the surety is liable only for the return of that portion which was then severable.[94]

Partial payment of judgment by third persons. While it has been held that a surety is discharged from liability where an insurer makes a partial payment on the judgment which payment exceeds the penalty of the bond,[95] it has also been held that such partial payment will not discharge the surety, but he must pay the remainder up to the penalty of the bond.[96]

Illegality or impossibility of performance. It has been held that, where the condition of a forthcoming bond subsequently becomes illegal or impossible of performance, the sureties are discharged from liability.[97]

Where property perishes from natural causes or is destroyed by accident without fault of the surety, the general rule is that he is discharged from liability on his bond,[98] although there is authority to the con-conditioned as required thereby, but recited that the sureties would be obligated if the property was not "forthcoming and subject to the orders of the court," it was held that, upon return of the property, and its sale under an order of the court, the sureties were discharged.—Rogers v Tri-State Motor Sales Co, 265 S W 80, 165 Ark 590

Mechanics' liens on realty

Where mechanics' liens were inchoate when the attachment on realty was dissolved, but were reduced to judgment pending judgment in the attachment suit, a late tender of such property subject to adjudicated liens furnishes no defense, as against the contention that the liens related to a date before the attachment was levied, for, as stated by the court "Had the property remained under attachment, it is undoubtedly true that such liens would have taken precedence over the lien of plaintiff's attachment. In that case, however, the plaintiff would have had the right to intervene in any action to enforce such preferred liens and to contest the validity or the amount thereof Plaintiff's attachment lien ceased upon the release of the property . . . He thereafter had no standing to appear in the actions wherein the preferred liens were prosecuted to judgment If he is bound to accept redelivery of the property encumbered with the liens of the judgments entered in such actions, then the security which he obtained by levy of the writ of attachment, and the undertaking for release thereof, has been impaired by suits to which he was not and could not have become a party. 98. Jones & Dubuisson v. Picard, supra.

Accidental fire

Where an automobile was destroyed by an accidental fire, the surety on a forthcoming bond was discharged from his duty to produce the same because of impossibility of per-

trary.[99]

The fact that the property has been taken under a paramount title may operate in discharge of the surety on a forthcoming bond,[1] so, where defendant has given a replevy bond and the goods are repossessed by the conditional seller, the bond is discharged.[2]

Where plaintiff by his own act prevents the obligors from delivering the property and is thus himself the cause of the forfeiture, he cannot take advantage of it and the obligors will be discharged to the extent that they are thus prevented from making delivery,[3] but it is no defense to an action upon a dissolution bond that plaintiff[4] or the sheriff,[5] failed to pay off a lien on attached property, with the result that the property was surrendered to the holder of a title retaining note on release of the property.

b. Change in Obligation

The sureties upon a forthcoming or dissolution bond are discharged by a material change or alteration in their obligation without their consent, as, for example, by an amendment of the pleadings changing the cause of action. They are not, however, discharged by matters which do not affect the extent of their obligation, such as amendments of the pleadings not changing the cause of action, or by the taking of additional security, or a delay in the issuance of execution, or by the death of a party where the action is not destroyed.

Under rules of general application, which are considered at length in the title Principal and Surety §§ 124–127 [50 C.J. p 116 note 35–p 128 note 11], any material change or alteration in the contract of the sureties without their knowledge or consent will release them from liability.[6] However, a mere spoliation or alteration of the bond by a stranger or unauthorized third person will not have this effect but the sureties will be liable according to the original tenor of the instrument.[7] Further, the subsequent acts or agreements of the parties must have the effect of modifying the contract of suretyship in order to work a discharge of the sureties.[8] Thus the mere failure to prosecute a motion for a new trial or the entry into a stipulation waiving an appeal will not discharge the surety in the absence of fraud or collusion,[9] nor will the termination of the receiver's control of an action discharge the surety on a bond of the receiver, his successors, and assigns,[10] nor will a reference to arbitration by consent of the parties discharge the surety on a dissolution bond[11] or a removal of a cause from a state to a federal court discharge a redelivery bond.[12] So an unsuccessful attempt of the attaching creditor to prevent the release of the attached property upon the ground that the bond is invalid is not such an interference with the rights and prejudice to the interests of the surety on the bond as to discharge him from liability,[13] and a subsequent agreement between plaintiff and defendant whereby defendant paid certain sums to secure the release of a subsequent attachment does not release the surety upon defendant's bond given to dissolve an attachment of other property of defendant where final judgment against defendant had been had and remained unpaid and the bond is conditioned for the payment of any final judgment rendered against defendant.[14] Plaintiff in attachment does not lose his recourse against a bond given for the release of attached property by accepting a dividend from the assignee for the benefit of the creditors of defendant in attachment.[15]

Agreement to accept installments. A stipulation filed in court whereby defendant agreed to pay in installments, or, on default, that judgment might be entered for the balance, has been held to discharge the surety, because it changed the nature of the claim,[16] but it has been held to the contrary that an agreement to pay in installments accompanied by delay in trial did not have this effect.[17]

Delay or extension of time. Although as a general rule any extension of time for the performance of an obligation will discharge a surety, the fact that a case was continued from term to term before trial is not such an extension as will release the surety.[18]

Requirement of additional security or execution of new bond. The refusal to approve a dissolution bond until strengthened by the addition of another surety will not, after it is so strengthened and approved, exonerate the sureties who signed it originally.[19] The acceptance by the clerk of a new bond will not discharge the sureties on the former bond where it was valid and the clerk had no authority to surrender the former and accept a substitute.[20] The sureties are not discharged where the court makes a void order for a new bond and such order is not complied with.[21]

Where, after the execution of a common-law bond, a second and statutory form of bond is executed, it may be inferred that the second bond is accepted in substitution for the first, which becomes no longer in force.[22]

Amendment of writ. If the parties without the consent of the surety alter the return time of the writ from a date when there was no term of court so as to make it returnable to a proper date, and the dissolution bond recited that the writ was returnable on the first date, the surety is discharged.[23]

Amendment of pleadings. The sureties upon an undertaking for the release of an attachment have, as has been noted, the right to stand on the very terms of their contract, and, if their obligation has been changed without their consent, they are released from liability. Accordingly, an amendment bringing in a new cause of action,[24] or merging causes of action,[25] will release the surety.

Sureties on a forthcoming bond, or a bond conditioned to pay the judgment, are not discharged by proper amendment of the attachment affidavit, or of the declaration or writ, the identity of the action not being changed.[26] Such bonds are not discharg-

Stipulation held no consent

A stipulation signed by the attorney of a surety on undertaking to release an attachment, permitting plaintiff to prosecute a claim thereafter assigned to it in the original action without prejudice to any rights which defendants may have against plaintiff, etc., was not a consent that the sureties' agreement should be altered so as to cover the new debt set up in the amended complaint.—Michelin Tire Co. v. Amendment to correct clerical errors in a bond to dissolve an attachment does not relieve the surety from liability thereon.—Gordon & Dilworth v. Abbott, 154 N.E. 523, 258 Mass. 35.

Amendment waiving personal judgment

Where a cause of action is amended so that a personal judgment is not sought, but merely a judgment upholding the attachment, the essential liability is not altered and the surety remains liable on his bond.—Spokane Merchants' Ass'n v. Mussellman, 234 P. 1033, 134 Wash. 116.

Clarifying declaration

Where a declaration in an action against a maker and an indorser of a note set out the note without clearly pleading the nature of each defendant's liability, the allowance of a substitute declaration charging them as maker and indorser in separate counts, without notice to the sureties on the dissolution bond, after trial, before the auditor, did not introduce a new cause of action, nor injuriously affect their substantial rights, and hence did not discharge them.—Savage v. Walshe, 140 N.E. 787, 246 Mass. 170.

Cause of action not changed

Where one count of a complaint was amended by substituting for a claim on a canceled contract a claim on a new contract for a less amount, which agreement recognized, liquidated, and promised to pay the former claim, the amendment did not discharge the surety, the two claims being substantially for the same indebtedness.—Rio Grande Oil Co. v. Seaboard Surety Corporation of America, (Cal.App.) 33 P.(2d) 887.

Change in remedy

(1) Where a complaint alleging that plaintiff had security for a portion of the debt is amended by omitting reference to the security, there is no new cause of action, although the remedy sought may be changed, and the surety is not released by such amendment.—Sloan v. Young, 284 P. 131, 86 Mont. 414.

(2) Where the remedy sought was changed by an amendment releasing the security for the debt, but the property subject to the security was attached and sold to satisfy the judgment, the security cannot complain of the amendment, assuming that such amendment would otherwise be material.—Sloan v. Young, supra.

Where the evidence was the same at the first and second trials, there was no change of cause of action releasing the surety from liability on a dissolution bond, securing release of attached property.—Hill v. Wilson, 261 P. 422, 123 Or. 193.

An increase in the ad damnum, even beyond the penalty of the bond, will not discharge the surety where the cause of action is not changed.—Turner v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of ed necessarily and as a matter of law by an amendment as to the name of a party[27] by bringing in a new defendant,[28] or by substituting defendants, where the substitution is as to one not a party to the bond,[29] or by substituting for plaintiff in attachment his assignee, under an assignment for the benefit of creditors made after execution of the bond.[30]

An amendment changing the name of one of two copartners suing and adding a third partner so changes the nature of the action that a judgment cannot be entered against the obligee as stipulated in the bond.[31]

The amendment of a cause of action which brings into the case a party in lieu of a nonexistent corporation will, according to some authorities, so alter the liability as to discharge the surety on the dissolution bond,[32] while other authorities hold the contrary.[33]

Some courts take the view that where the amendment attempts to increase the amount of the claim, the surety is not discharged by such amendment, but he remains liable for the amount of the original claim,[34] while others hold that the surety is wholly discharged.[35]

It would seem that the sureties are not discharged by the amendment until judgment is entered; and consequently an amendment which has been waived will not discharge the surety, judgment being entered on the original cause of action.[36]

The failure of plaintiff to give the surety notice of a motion to amend the writ or pleadings will not necessarily discharge the sureties.[37] The only effect of a failure to so notify the surety is that he is not bound by the amendments but may attack their allowance in the action on the bond.[38] If the surety cannot show that the cause of action has been changed substantially, and that his burden has been increased, he is bound, notwithstanding want of notice of the motion to amend.[39]

Discontinuance as to part of defendants. Where an attachment suit is discontinued as against one principal on a bond, but the principal is not released thereby from liability on the bond, the obligation of the surety is not increased nor his remedies affected, and the surety is not discharged by such discontinuance.[40] The same rule applies to consent of plaintiff to an amended answer asserting that defendants are not partners,[41] but there is also authority for the view that the bond must be considered as referring to the suit in progress at the time of its execution,[42] and that a discontinuance as to one or more defendants is such a change in respect to the obligation of the sureties as will discharge them.[43]

Transfer from law to equity. Where defendants, in order to secure the release of attached property, entered into an undertaking to pay any judgment which might be recovered against the attachment defendant, and plaintiff was compelled by an injunction to litigate the cause in equity, defendants were held liable under their undertaking for the payment of a decree which expressly covered the damages of plaintiff in his suit at law notwithstanding the decree included claims other than the one for which defendants' undertaking was given since defendants' obligation, being to pay not the claim but the judgment obtained upon it, the fact that the judgment was obtained in chancery rather than at law is immaterial although the action or cause of action to which their obligation related is merged in such decree.[44] The further fact that the decree adjusted the claims of others than plaintiff will not release defendants.[45]

Stay or delay in issuance of execution. The liability of the obligors on a forthcoming or dissolution bond being fixed by the rendition of a judgment against the attachment defendant, the sureties are not released by a delay in issuing execution on the judgment,[46] nor does a stay of execution by consent of the parties to the action have this effect.[47]

Assuming that a perpetual stay of execution might release the surety, the acceptance of an offer to stay must be made within a reasonable time, otherwise the surety will remain liable.[48]

Death of defendant. Where the cause of action survives, and the death of the attachment defendant does not operate as a dissolution of the attachment, judgment against his personal representative will perfect the liability of the sureties on a forthcoming or dissolution bond;[49] but, on the other hand, it is held that, where the death of defendant in attachment dissolves it, attachment plaintiff has no further claim on the property and cannot recover on the bond.[50]

c. Fraud or Collusion; Release of Indemnity

The surety may be discharged by fraud or collusion between the debtor and the creditor, as where it results in his failure to obtain or his release of indemnity; but he is not discharged by his loss of indemnity through his own fault.

The surety may be discharged from his liability by fraud or collusion between the debtor and creditor,[51] as where it results in a failure to defend a doubtful claim[52] or in a judgment for a larger amount than plaintiff is entitled to.[53]

Plaintiff owes no duty to the surety to disclose matters concerning the attachment suit, and the surety on a dissolution bond is not discharged by his failure to do so.[54] The promise of plaintiff's attorney to keep the surety informed, if made and not kept, will not relieve the surety from liability.[55]

Where the surety has been lulled into security by the acts and conduct of the creditor, and in consequence thereof fails to obtain indemnity or make an effort to do so, he is wholly discharged, but if he only surrenders certain property held by him as collateral security to the principal debtor, and has not been otherwise damaged, he is discharged only to the extent of the value of the property surrendered.[56] If, shortly after an order quashing an attachment is made, it is set aside at the same term, but meanwhile the surety has surrendered property held by him as indemnity to the debtor, he is not discharged from the loss due to his haste and precipitancy.[57]

d. Dismissal of Principal Action or Judgment for Defendant; Dissolution or Discharge of Attachment

The sureties upon a dissolution or forthcoming bond are discharged by a judgment in favor of the defendant upon the principal demand or a dismissal of the action. Whether they are discharged by a failure of the plaintiff to sustain the attachment issue, is dependent upon the character of the bond which has been given.

Where the action in which the property was attached results in a judgment in favor of defendant, the obligors on the bond, whether it is for a discharge of the attachment or merely for a release of the property, are of course released from any liability on the bond.[58]

Where judgment is rendered against one defendant and in favor of another, and as to the latter no bond is given on appeal, the attachment has not been lost, and the surety remains liable on the forthcoming bond for the value of the property released where the judgment is reversed and rendered for plaintiff on appeal.[59]

Dismissal of action. Dismissal of the cause under a rule of court for want of prosecution discharges the sureties, and a reinstatement of the cause has no effect on the bond.[60] Where the attachment suit has been dismissed by stipulation and the redelivery bond exonerated, a creditor who claims an interest in the attachment proceeding and bond has, under statutory provision, a right to intervene in the attachment proceeding, but who has not done so, cannot recover upon the redelivery bond without an adjudication setting aside the order dismissing the attachment suit and exonerating the bond.[61]

Vacation of or failure to sustain attachment. As a general rule it is no defense that the attachment has been annulled where the action is on a dissolution bond,[62] unless the attachment is set aside for want of jurisdiction and there is a consequent failure of consideration.[63] Where, however, it is held that defendant in attachment may proceed to vacate the attachment notwithstanding he has given a dissolution or discharge bond, it would seem that such a bond also will fall with the attachment upon quashal or vacation.[64]

The obligors on a forthcoming, delivery, or replevy bond are released from liability thereon where the attachment is afterward quashed or vacated, or there is a failure to sustain the attachment issue,[65] as on failure to give an attachment bond,[66] or where the only ground for attachment was abandoned.[67] On dismissal of the attachment, no liability exists as to the obligors on a forthcoming bond, notwithstanding the action may have proceeded to a personal judgment against defendant.[68]

Necessity of setting aside dismissal

Where the attachment has been

A replevy bond in attachment proceedings is discharged by a decree adjudging the property exempt;[69] and where foreclosure of the attachment lien was denied on the ground of such exemption, although judgment went against defendant for the debt, it could not be rendered against the sureties on the replevy bond for the exempt property.[70]

Where judgment of dissolution reversed on appeal. Where an attachment was dissolved and plaintiff appealed suspensively, thus annulling the judgment of the trial court, as discussed in Appeal and Error § 548, the attachment remaining in full force, the surety was not discharged from liability on the bond.[71]

e. Pursuit of or Failure to Pursue Collateral Remedies

Failure of the creditor to pursue collateral remedies which he may have will not ordinarily discharge a surety on a release bond.

Generally speaking, the surety is not discharged by the failure of the creditor to pursue collateral remedies to collect his judgment,[72] as by failure to prosecute the breach of a recognizance;[73] and, where a conditional vendor or a mortgagee waives his lien and sues for the debt, his failure to enforce his lien will not release the surety.[74]

Where an undertaking is given to pay any judgment which might be recovered in the attachment proceeding and, before such judgment is recovered, plaintiff is enjoined from proceeding in the suit at law and compelled to establish his claim in chancery, the liability upon the undertaking is not released by the fact that plaintiff might have secured a writ of sequestration in the chancery proceedings and so have secured protection equivalent to the benefit of defendant's obligation, and this is particularly true in view of the fact that executions upon the decree were returned nulla bona.[75]

Where a defendant in an attachment appeals unsuccessfully, plaintiff may sue the sureties on the bond given to release the attached property without resorting to his remedy against the sureties on the appeal bond, although the latter may be primarily liable.[76]

Where the judgment is not paid by an administrator because the claim is barred by failure to present it in due time, the surety is not thereby discharged.[77]

Arrest of debtor on execution The arrest of a debtor on execution in the principal action will not discharge the sureties upon a bond previously given for the dissolution of the attachment.[78]

f. Failure to Take Judgment against Sureties

A failure to take judgment against the sureties in the principal action as permitted by statute does not necessarily discharge them.

A statutory remedy afforded by a statute providing that where property has been released by virtue of a forthcoming bond the court upon giving judgment against defendant shall also give judgment in like manner and with like effect against the sureties is not, as will be seen in § 317b, exclusive; hence a failure to render such a judgment against the sureties at the time of giving judgment against defendant does not discharge them from liability and preclude the pursuit of other remedies upon the bond.[79] Where a judgment against defendant is appealed from and reversed, the surety on a dissolution bond is not discharged from liability to a judgment against him in the second trial of the action by the fact that judgment was not taken against him upon the first trial.[80]

g. Subsequent Levy on Property

A subsequent levy on released property will discharge sureties on a forthcoming bond, but not on a dissolution bond.

Where the property released on bond is subsequent-dismissed and the bond exonerated, there can be no action on the bond until the order of dismissal and exoneration has been set aside—First Nat Bank v Denbrae Sheep Co, 258 P 365, 44 Idaho 447

ly seized and sold on another attachment, the sureties on the release bond cannot be held liable for failure to deliver the property.[81] Ordinarily the subsequent levy will discharge the surety only where such levy renders redelivery impossible.[82] Accordingly, where the property has been promptly released to defendant on a second redelivery bond, and it is possible to perform the condition of the first bond, the surety is not discharged.[83] It has also been held that plaintiff may show he instructed the sheriff to attach other property not previously seized, and the violation of such instructions by the sheriff would not discharge the surety.[84]

A subsequent attachment by the same creditor must be levied on the identical property previously released to discharge the surety,[85] and where part only of the released property is subsequently attached, this does not exonerate the surety from his obligation to redeliver the balance.[86]

Where a bond removes the lien from the property and leaves it subject to future levies, the subsequent levies of attachments will not discharge the surety on the bond,[87] but if, after the execution of the bond, the officer levies another attachment before a delivery is necessary to discharge the condition thereof, such subsequent seizure will amount to a delivery and discharge the same.[88]

By levy of execution. It has been held that if execution is issued and levied on property sufficient to satisfy the judgment, the voluntary release of the attachment lien by plaintiff will discharge the surety on the bond.[89] However, a levy of execution on the goods released will discharge the sureties only to the extent of amount received on execution.[90]

a. Right of Action

A right of action arises upon the bond upon a breach of its conditions.

Upon a breach of the conditions of a bond given to secure the release of attached property, a right of action arises on the bond in favor of the obligee named therein,[91] and, under some statutes, the liability of the sureties on a replevy bond exists as a matter of law if the liability of attachment defendant is established in the suit.[92] While strangers to the proceedings do not have a right of action on the restitution bond,[93] the assignment of a judgment in an attachment suit without mention of the bond impliedly carries with it a right of action on the bond in favor of the assignee.[94]

b. Nature and Form of Remedy

The remedy on bonds of the character under consideration ordinarily may be by an independent action on the bond, or, under some statutes by the summary entry of judgment against the sureties on the bond upon entry of judgment against defendant.

Of course, the nature and form of the remedy upon a forthcoming, release, or replevy bond depends upon the statutes of the particular jurisdiction where relief is sought. Where the statute makes no provision for summary judgment on the bond or undertaking, a separate action must be brought on the bond, unless by consent the surety comes in the pro-

Proration. A creditor other than the original plaintiff is not entitled to proration in an action on a redelivery bond unless he has first intervened in the attachment suit and established a statutory right to such proration—First Nat Bank v Denbrae Sheep Co, 258 P. 365, 44 Idaho 447

ceedings,[95] and a statutory remedy providing for summary judgment against the sureties on an attachment, release, or forthcoming bond, in the absence of a further statutory provision to the contrary, is merely a cumulative remedy and not an exclusive one, and does not bar an independent action on the bond.[96] Under some statutes, the court may enter judgment summarily against the sureties on entering judgment against defendant, or enter judgment on motion or rule against the sureties,[97] particularly where the sureties by signing the bond become parties to the proceedings;[98] and summary judgment may also be entered against the sureties on the bond in a suit against the sheriff for failure to produce the goods, which suit is in effect a continuation of the attachment proceedings.[99] Likewise, under some statutes, upon failure to redeliver property after judgment against defendant, and a return by the officer of the bond forfeited on account of such failure, such return is given the force and effect of a judgment and authorizes the clerk to issue execution against all the obligors.[1] Under some statutes it has also been held that the remedy on the bond may be by scire facias as in other cases.[2]

Statutes authorizing summary remedies on forthcoming, delivery, or dissolution bonds are to be strictly construed, and one who seeks to enforce the liability of the obligors in this manner must comply, at least substantially, with the requirements of the statute in respect to all things which must be done in order to make the statutory remedy available.[3]

It seems that the statutory judgment of condemnation and of forfeiture of the bond cannot be entered summarily on a bond which is not in the statutory form,[4] although the defects do not prevent its enforcement as a common-law obligation.[5]

Election of remedy. Where a redelivery bond was conditioned in the alternative to redeliver the attached property or pay the appraised value thereof, and the obligors fail to do either, the obligee may then elect which alternative he will rely on.[6]

Notice. Under some statutes, the court has power to enter judgment against a surety without notice, where he has by his bond on record, conditioned as provided by statute for the performance and satisfaction by the principal of any judgment rendered against him in the action become, for this purpose, a party to the original suit or consented that judgment should be so entered.[7] It should be noted that this the right to enter summary judgment without notice is subject to the right of the surety to appear and defend, if, for any reason, he is discharged, exonerated, or has a valid defense.[8]

On the other hand, where the statute so requires, notice to the surety is essential, and if application is not made for summary judgment at the time specified in the notice it must be deemed abandoned.[9]

Remedy in equity. Where the statute provides that the bond shall be a lien on the obligor's real estate, but provides no procedure for the enforcement of the lien, resort may be had to equity to secure enforcement thereof, particularly where since the filing of the bond the obligor's property has become heavily encumbered thereby rendering an action at law on the bond inadequate Under such circumstances, where the statute does not expressly authorize the filing of a petition, the remedy should be sought by bill of complaint [10]

Simultaneous actions. Where defendant in attachment gave bond for the dissolution of the attachment, and, within thirty days after judgment for plaintiff in attachment, and before action was brought on the dissolution bond, defendant was arrested and gave a poor debtor's recognizance, it was held that plaintiff could maintain actions on the bond and on the recognizance at the same time.[11]

Reformation of bond. Where a bond is on its face erroneous, the court may reform the bond to conform to the obvious intention of the parties, and enforce the bond as reformed.[12]

c. Time to Sue

Action may be brought on the bond after liability has attached thereon.

The time for bringing action on a forthcoming, release, or replevin bond depends, of course upon the time liability attaches on the bond under the statutes of the particular jurisdiction and the conditions of the bond. Under a statute providing that plaintiff may prosecute on the bond or undertaking if execution against the attachment defendant be returned unsatisfied, action may be brought immediately on the return of the execution unsatisfied, and it is not necessary to postpone the bringing of the action until the time for appeal has passed [13] Also, where the execution has been returned unsatisfied, a bill to fix a lien on the surety's realty is not premature merely because brought before the return day of the execution [14]

d. Defenses and Estoppel

The invalidity or nonexistence of the bond, or a discharge from its obligations are ordinarily the only defenses available in an action thereon. The parties are ordinarily concluded by the recitals in the bond.

Generally, the only defenses available in an action on a bond given to secure a release of attached property are those raising the validity or existence of the bond,[15] or which show a discharge from its obligations [16] Accordingly, failure of consideration[17] or forgery[18] is available as a defense to an action on the bond.

As a general rule, if the principal is bound the sureties are also bound, and accordingly, in an action on or proceeding to enforce the bond, the sureties cannot set up any defenses which are not available to their principal [19] For example, if the judgment is valid as against attachment defendant it will not avail the obligors that it contains other provisions which, although void, do not affect defendant.[20]

Neither principal nor sureties can base an effective defense on the lack of an appraisement or inventory of the property,[21] a failure to enter the writ on the return day,[22] irregularities in the form[23] or execution[24] of the bond; the lack of approval of the

Defect in signature

The surety on a bond to dissolve an attachment cannot take advantage of an abbreviation in the principal's signature —Andrews v. Bellilove, 143 A 857, 49 R I 446.

Late delivery

The surety cannot complain that a bond executed as a statutory obligation was delivered late and thus became a common-law obligation on the same terms —Waverly Lumber Co. v Piantedosi, 160 N E. 263, 262 Mass. 377.

bond,[25] a failure to deliver or file the bond,[26] or to record the release of attached property as required by statute,[27] or the fact that the creditor gained nothing by the attachment of the debtor's property, and lost nothing by its dissolution, because the goods at the time of the attachment were in the custody of the sheriff under a levy on a prior execution on which they were sold.[28] The solvency of the principals in the forthcoming bond is also immaterial,[29] unless they have been adjudicated bankrupt within four months of the levy of attachment, as discussed in Bankruptcy § 252 [7 C.J. p 199 note 2].

While fraud is not available to a surety on a release or forthcoming bond unless plaintiff was a party to the fraud,[30] fraud on the part of plaintiff or his attorney, such as misrepresenting the effect of the bond, is available as a defense thereto.[31]

Where the bond is conditioned to redeliver the property to the proper officer or pay plaintiff the full value thereof, not exceeding the amount of the judgment, an offer to return the property, to be a defense to an action on the bond, must be to return the entire property, and an offer not made in good faith, as where there is no present ability to perform, does not constitute a defense.[32]

The remedies of foreclosure of a mortgage lien and attachment for the debt due are not inconsistent, and the pursuance of both is no objection to an action on a replevy bond where the property attached is that subject to the mortgage.[33] That a judgment creditor sued the principal debtor on the judgment was no waiver of his right to sue the sureties on a bond given by the debtor to release an attachment.[34]

Defenses in summary proceedings. A statute providing a summary remedy against the obligors in a bond does not prohibit or impair the effect of any legal defense.[35]

Estoppel by recitals in bond Ordinarily the obligors in a forthcoming or discharge bond are concluded by the recitals made in the undertaking,[36] and this rule applies with equal force whether the undertaking is a statutory or a common-law bond.[37] However, it has been held that a recital in the bond that there was an attachment will not estop the obligor to show that there was no attachment where both parties acted under a mutual mistake of fact.[38]

(1) Plaintiffs

Plaintiff is a proper party in an action on a bond given to him, and where the real party in interest can sue in his own name, he can sue thereon even though the bond runs to the sheriff. Where the bond runs to several jointly, all should join in suing thereon, and in case of the death of some of the obligees, the survivors may sue.

Fraud discharging surety see § 316

Fraud as to amount of bond
Testimony by a surety as to the principal's false representation as to the amount of a release bond is inadmissible to impeach its validity as to attachment plaintiffs not parties to the fraud and without knowledge thereof—Andrews v Mollica, 167 A 131, 53 R I 427.

Misrepresentation by agent of obligee's attorney
The surety, in an action on a bond to dissolve an attachment, was not released by misrepresentations of the obligee's nephew while employed by the obligee's attorney where the misrepresentations were made without the obligee's authorization or knowledge—Rice v Rosenberg, 178 N E 724, 277 Mass 334

31. Fritts v Reidel, 165 P. 671, 101 Kan 68

Where surety illiterate
Where the nature and effect of a proposed redelivery bond in attachment were stated by the attorney for plaintiff to the surety, and the attorney wrote a bond, which was in fact a statutory forthcoming bond, differing materially from representations, and statements concerning the nature and effect thereof which were repeated before the surety, who was unable to read English script, in reliance on which he signed, such representations were equivalent to representations relating to contents of a written instrument and constituted a defense to an action on such bond—Fritts v Reidel, 233 P. 1015, 118 Kan 9.

Where the bond is given to plaintiff in the attachment suit, he is the proper party to sue on it;[39] but where the bond is given to the levying officer as obligee, proceedings for its enforcement are properly brought in his name.[40] In the case bond is given to the levying officer, plaintiff in attachment cannot, in some jurisdictions, maintain an action thereon in his own name,[41] unless the bond has been assigned to him,[42] or the statute authorizes an action thereon in his own name by the real party in interest.[43] In the absence of a statute allowing separate suits by different plaintiffs, if there are several plaintiffs, and the bond is given to them jointly, they must all unite in an action thereon,[44] although if some of the attaching plaintiffs are deceased, the survivors may sue on the bond.[45]

Where, in two distinct suits, the property was released on a single bond containing distinct obligations in favor of different obligees, it was held that each obligee had a distinct remedy on the bond for the satisfaction of any judgment in his suit.[46]

Where, on the execution of a forthcoming bond, all creditors who attach during the pendency of the first suit acquire an interest in the bond, they are properly joined as parties plaintiff and may sue to enforce liability on the bond.[47] Where, however, under the statute, the bond is held for the benefit of all creditors and may be prosecuted by them jointly or by any one of them separately in respect to his separate demand, an action on the statutory bond conditioned to pay each creditor the amount due him may be maintained by a single creditor in his own name.[48]

Assignment of bond. Where the bond given by attachment defendant is made to the officer as obligee, the latter may assign it to plaintiff in the attachment, who may then sue on it.[49] An attaching plaintiff to whom a release bond is executed may assign it,[50] and where plaintiff as the real party may sue on the bond made to the sheriff, his assignee may maintain an action on such bond.[51] It is unnecessary, however, to set forth the name of an assignee after verdict as plaintiff where the action is brought in the name of the assignor for the use of the assignee.[52]

(2) Defendants

An action on a joint and several redelivery or dissolution bond may be brought against any obligee therein, and a joinder of principal and surety is not required.

An action on a joint and several bond for the release of property seized under attachment may be brought against any one or more of the obligors and a joinder of all is unnecessary.[53] Thus, the surety may be sued separately and the principal is not a necessary party,[54] and where the undertaking sued on is, by its express terms, joint and several, a dismissal as to one surety does not affect plaintiff's right to judgment against the other.[55]

On the death of defendant, his heirs at law, although nonresidents, are proper, if not necessary, parties.[56]

ant with such fullness, definiteness, and certainty that defendant will be able clearly to understand and intelligently to answer it [57]

It is, ordinarily, essential that plaintiff should allege that defendant executed and delivered the bond sued on,[58] but in jurisdictions where judgment may be summarily entered on the bond in the attachment suit, the bond need not be pleaded.[59]

In an action on an undertaking, by defendant in an attachment case, to secure the release of the attached property, it is necessary to aver that the attached property was restored to defendant.[60] It is also incumbent on plaintiff in such an action to set out in his declaration or complaint the condition of the bond.[61] and to allege facts which constitute a breach of such condition,[62] as that the attachment was released or discharged, where the consideration of the bond is such release or discharge,[63] the recovery of judgment in the attachment suit,[64] and that the attachment was not dissolved.[65]

The complaint on an undertaking to release attached property must show the regular issue and return unsatisfied of an execution,[66] and where a complaint shows a premature return of execution, it must also show that the debtor had no property or means, otherwise the complaint is fatally defective;[67] but a failure to allege an issue and return of execution is not fatal where the debtor is insolvent and where no objection is taken thereto by demurrer.[68] It is also necessary to allege an order in the attachment proceedings for the sale or return of the attached property,[69] or a demand for redelivery of the property, or for payment,[70] and a failure to comply therewith,[71] where the liability under the bond is con-

57. Ward v. Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Co, 208 P 188, 57 Cal App. 623—6 C J p 355 note 79.

Alleging statutory ownership

Under a statute providing that, from the date of the attachment until it is discharged or the writ executed, plaintiff as against third persons shall be deemed a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration of the property, etc, an attaching creditor, in order to be deemed a purchaser in good faith as against the owner of an outstanding equity, must, in an action on a bond for redelivery of the property, allege and prove all the facts necessary to establish that character of his ownership, as against the equity. —Flegel v Koss, 33 P 847, 47 Or 366—6 C J. p 355 note 80.

Alleging value

(1) Where plaintiff seeks to recover the amount of his judgment under a bond conditioned to return the property or pay the value thereof not exceeding the amount of the judgment, or to pay the amount of the judgment and costs which plaintiff might recover, a complaint is not defective for failure to allege the value of the property seized, at least where it is alleged that defendant, after demand made, failed to comply with any of the alternatives — Huish v. Fenkell, (Utah) 39 P (2d) 330

(2) Where the obligation is to pay the value of the property released, not exceeding the amount of the judgment, and it is alleged that payment of the judgment was demanded and that the value of the property exceeds the judgment, it is not necessary to allege that the surety knew the value of the property, the practice being that defendant object to the amount demanded if the value of the property is less than the amount of the judgment.—Ward v. Massachusetts Bonding & Insurance Co. 208 P. 188, 57 Cal App 623.

Sufficient allegation of restoration

In an action on a bond to discharge an attachment, an allegation that the attached property was released to defendant on the giving of the bond is a sufficient averment of the restoration of the property to defendant—Toelle v. National Surety Co, 223 P 256, 115 Kan 425

Complaint held sufficient

In an action against a surety on a bond to release an attachment, an averment that defendant in the main action did not have any property subject to levy or means wherewith to satisfy the execution or judgment on the date on which the execution issued or at any time thereafter between the date of the issuance of the execution and the earliest date a return of the execution was permitted by law to be made or at any other time thereafter, when supported by proof, was sufficient—Passow & Sons v. ditioned on these things.

It has also been held that a declaration in covenant on the bond may be good without an averment that an order was made in the suit in chancery in which the attachment was issued remitting plaintiff to his remedy at law on the instrument.[72]

Action on bond to prevent levy. In an action on a bond to prevent attachment levy, an allegation that, on delivery of the bond to the sheriff, he refrained from levying the attachment and accepted the bond in lieu of levy sufficiently shows that the bond induced the sheriff to withhold levy, although another bond for the same purpose was previously given;[73] but a complaint which fails to aver that the sheriff did not complete the levy, or avers that the sheriff proceeded to levy, without showing that he went no further, is defective.[74]

With respect to the judgment in the main action, an averment that judgment was recovered, entered, and docketed is sufficient.[75]

Facts concluded by recitals of bond. In an action on an undertaking for the release of attached property, the complaint need not aver or set out facts which the obligor in the bond is estopped to deny by the recitals in the bond or by the execution of it.[76]

Action to recover for depreciation. In an action on a redelivery bond to recover for diminution in value of property returned by defendant, an allegation that the property was injured by usage and neglect sufficiently charges that defendant was in fault.[77]

Surplusage in the declaration or complaint may be disregarded as immaterial.[78]

(2) For Defendant

To be sufficient the plea or answer must put in issue the defense on which defendant relies.

In accordance with the general rules of pleadings, a plea or answer in an action on a bond given to secure the release of attached property to be sufficient must raise an issue to make available any defense on which defendant relies,[79] and clearly set forth matters of affirmative defense.[80]

In a debt on a bond given to discharge an attachment, the action is on the specialty and a plea of nil debet is not appropriate.[81] A statement filed under the general issue, equivalent to a plea of nil debet, is

Where defendant did not controvert the allegation of the complaint that, after the default of attachment defendant "was duly entered" by the clerk of the court, the clerk thereupon "duly entered judgment therein" against the debtors, a copy of which judgment was annexed as an exhibit, defendant thereby admitted that the judgment, including the order of sale, was duly entered as an order of the court, and not as a mere clerk's order—Johnston v Shaw, (Alaska) 190 F. 466, 111 C C A 298

Plea in bar held sufficient.—Hogan v. Shutler, 53 Ill. 437

80. Attacking trial of main action

A surety cannot avail himself of the defense that the judgment in the attachment suit was rendered without a fair trial without alleging the particular facts not presented at the trial—Bailey v. Ætna Indemn. Co , 91 P. 416, 5 Cal App 740.

Facts discharging surety

If it is contended that discontinuance as to one defendant released the surety, such defense must be raised by pleading—King v. Malone, 99 A 691, 91 Conn. 342.

Fraud

(1) If the surety claims that there was a collusive failure to introduce available evidence constituting a defense to the action, he must plead the details and his ability to supply on a new trial the evidence willfully suppressed—Bailey v Ætna Indemn. Co , 91 P. 416, 5 Cal App. 740

(2) An answer setting up that plaintiff misrepresented the legal effect of the bond, without averring facts showing why defendants had a right to rely on any superior knowledge of plaintiff, states no defense—Lott v. Porter, 133 S.W. 180, 97 Ark 97

Nonownership

(1) It has been held that, where the defense that the property levied on did not belong to defendant in attachment is available to the obligors on the bond given to discharge the property from the attachment, or for its redelivery, defendants must show by their pleading in whom the title was—Blatchley v. Adair, 5 Iowa 545.

(2) The act of the court, in an action on a bond given to obtain a release of property attached, in treating an averment of the answer of the surety that defendant had little interest in the property when it was attached as explanatory of the liability of the surety was not prejudicial to him, he thereby obtaining the right to show the actual value of defendant's interest—Mallory v. Hartman, 86 A 567, 86 Conn. 615.

Object of bond defeated

If defendants desire to defend on the ground that the object of the bond or undertaking was defeated after it was given, such fact must be set up in the answer—Bennett v. Mulry, 36 N.Y S 790, 6 Misc 304.

Void attachment

In order to raise the defense that the attachment issued without the necessary accompanying bond, the surety should distinctly and unequivocally aver in his plea that no attachment bond had been executed before the issue and levy of the attachment—English v. Reed, 25 S E. 325, 97 Ga 477.

Statute held or[illegible] limitation

A statute pr[illegible]ing an action on an attachment dissolution bond after six years from its date is a statute of limitations, which must be pleaded—Castaline v Swardlick, 163 N. E 62, 264 Mass 481.

Want of consideration

Since a bond imports consideration, want of consideration is an affirmative defense which defendant must plead—O'Byrne v. McCormick, (Mo App) 92 S W (2d) 1005

81. Blydenburgh v Carpenter, Lalor (N Y.) 169—6 C J. p 357 note 9.

inappropriate as a plea of the general issue.[82]

A plea of non est factum with notice of special matter that an appeal had been taken and allowed to the supreme court has been held not to show a defense, because there was no allegation that the appeal was still pending.[83]

(3) Judgment on Pleadings

Judgment may be entered on the pleadings where the defendant's plea or answer is or becomes insufficient.

An action on a dissolution bond conditioned to satisfy judgment comes within a statute authorizing plaintiff to take judgment at the first day of the term, on filing an affidavit stating the true amount of defendant's indebtedness and the writing or account by which defendant is indebted, unless defendant has filed a verified plea containing a good defense,[84] authorizing judgment on the pleadings if the facts in the complaint are insufficiently denied or substantially admitted,[85] or authorizing judgment in an action on an instrument for the payment of money only, for the sum claimed in the complaint, on striking out as frivolous a demurrer to the complaint.[86]

(4) Issues, Proof, and Variance

General rules of pleading control as to questions of issues, proof, and variance.

As in other civil actions, the issues are, in an action on a forthcoming or release bond, confined to those raised by the pleadings Ordinarily, the only question is whether there has been a breach of the bond,[87] and no issue can properly be raised as to the title to the property involved[88] A general denial in an action on a forthcoming, delivery, or discharge bond puts in issue only the material allegations of the complaint,[89] and a simple denial of the existence of the judgment in the attachment suit does not present the question of its invalidity so as to entitle the sureties to take advantage thereof.[90] A plea of non est factum puts in issue only the execution of the bond.[91]

Where an answer admits a waiver of demand by failure to deny an allegation thereof, the fact of demand cannot be put in issue.[92]

Proof. In accordance with the rules governing civil actions generally, in an action on a bond of the type under consideration, only such matters as are raised by the issues under the pleadings need be, or may be, proved. Accordingly, under a general denial, only the material allegations need be proved,[93] and, if the only plea is non est factum, plaintiff need not prove nonpayment of the judgment.[94] The attachment and replevin bond need not be introduced in evidence where they are part of the record in the case[95] Where defendant is deceased and his heirs have been substituted as parties but not served, it need not be shown that they received the property in order to render the surety liable for failure to redeliver the attached property.[96]

Likewise, under a plea of non est factum, it cannot be shown that the bond was not taken in accordance with the statutory requirements[97] The judgment against defendant and the unsatisfied execution thereon are admissible to show a breach of the bond,[98] and it cannot be shown that the judgment rendered in the original suit was invalid.[99] The sureties are also precluded from inquiring into the correctness of the judgment in the attachment suit.[1]

Variance. As in other civil actions, in actions of the character under consideration an immaterial variance between the pleadings and proof is not fatal. For example, where, by reason of a clerical error, the bond sued on does not express the true intention of

Proof of original claim

Under an early statute in New York, in an action on a bond given to discharge a foreign attachment, the condition of which bond was to pay the attaching creditor the amount justly due and owing by the debtor at the time the former became an attaching creditor, on account of any sum so claimed and sworn to by him, the creditor was required to establish his demand in the same manner as in an action against the debtor—Oakley v. the parties, but the error is not such as to invalidate the bond, as where plaintiff instead of defendant is named in the condition as the person in the event of whose payment of the judgment the bond shall be void, the fact that the declaration or complaint sets out the bond as it was intended to be written does not constitute such a material variance as to defeat a recovery,[2] and the fact that the complaint describes the bond sued on as an "undertaking pursuant to law," when it is in fact a common-law bond, is immaterial where the undertaking is set out in full in the complaint.[3] On the other hand, an action by the sheriff or constable suing for the use of one person is not sustainable by proof of a bond given another,[4] and where it is alleged that defendant in an attachment suit died before judgment, that his administrator was made defendant, and judgment was rendered against such administrator, a transcript showing judgment against defendant in his individual capacity will not sustain the declaration.[5]

g. Evidence

The evidence in actions on forthcoming or delivery bonds is subject to the rules of general application in civil actions.

As a general rule, matters which constitute plaintiff's cause of action on a redelivery or dissolution bond must be proved by plaintiff, while the obligors have the burden of proof of matters in defense, mitigation, or discharge. Thus plaintiff has the burden of showing the execution of the bond by defendants,[6] the immateriality of an alteration,[7] or the value of the property where the obligation of the bond is measured thereby,[8] and the burden is on defendant to show that the attachment defendant was not the owner of the attached property where he defends on that ground,[9] that the interest of the principal in the property attached was less than the amount of the attachment,[10] that the judgment was obtained by collusion or fraud,[11] that the property was lost without defendant's fault,[12] that the attaching creditor seized and sold the same property after its release,[13] that the property was taken under a claim paramount to the levy which could not be successfully resisted,[14] or that the judgment in the suit has been paid.[15] Plaintiff is not bound to show that there was property subject to levy where the action is on a bond given to prevent levy,[16] and where, as has been seen in § 310 b (2), the bond precluded the right to question or attack the attachment, plaintiff need not prove the grounds for attachment.[17]

Presumptions. Sureties freely signing a bond are presumed to know its contents.[18] Where a valid judgment against defendant in attachment is shown, it will be presumed that it remains unpaid.[19] Where there is no showing to the contrary, it may be presumed that the levying officer did his duty in respect of filing a forthcoming bond,[20] that the writ was returned, or that the clerk was authorized to take and approve the bond.[21] Where liability on the bond is confined to attachment defendant's interest in the property, it will be presumed that such interest was the amount ordered to be attached by the writ.[22] A presumption which may be recognized as between the parties to the main proceeding, that an original complaint and an amended complaint are for an identical cause of action, does not apply to a surety.[23]

Admissibility. In actions on forthcoming or dissolution bonds any evidence otherwise competent under the general rules of evidence and relevant to the issues may be admitted. For example, on the issue of the execution of the bond by defendant it may be shown that another had acted under an antecedent authority on his behalf or that he had subsequently ratified an unauthorized act.[24] On the question of ownership of the attached property the financial condition of the debtor at, and prior to, the time of its purchase may be shown.[25] So, on a question of value, the amount received by a trustee in bankruptcy on a note and trade acceptance is admissible,[26] but a finding of the value of property at the time of a prior conversion is not evidence of its value at the time of an attachment several months later.[27] Evidence of depreciation of value of the property since the giving of the bond is not admissible unless shown not to have been caused by the act or negligence of the principal.[28] On the issue of whether plaintiff is the real party in interest in an action on a bond given in attachment in an action on a note, evidence that a note was given to plaintiff's attorney and not to plaintiff is admissible.[29] The judgment and an admittedly unsatisfied execution are admissible.[30] It may be shown that the surety's obligation has been discharged by an accord and satisfaction and release of the judgment against the principal.[31] As against a release given by plaintiff it may be shown that it was after assignment of the verdict.[32] The record of a duly signed release is admissible as tending to show the fact of signing.[33] On a question of fraud, evidence that a master in chancery told the surety that the attachment was not for more than the amount of the bond is not admissible.[34] Evidence of the mailing of a demand to defendant in care of another is not admissible where it is not shown that defendant authorized such mailing or received the demand.[35] A disposition of his goods by the principal may be shown where made after issuance of execution but not where made before issuance of execution unless collusion is shown.[36]

The official return of the sheriff on the attachment is evidence of his official acts as against both principal and surety in a forthcoming or dissolution bond,[37] and it has been held that the proper and legal method of showing whether the judgment in the attachment suit has been satisfied is by the return on the officer on the execution.[38] A sheriff's return, stating that he delivered the property to a third person at the request of defendant, is admissible as evidence of such delivery,[39] and testimony in denial of such return by one who was not entitled to the property and who is not shown to have knowledge as to the orders of the owner to the sheriff is of no probative value.[40]

Parol evidence will not be admitted for the purpose of showing that a bond plainly coming under the provisions of one statute was designed to operate under the provisions of an entirely different one,[41] or to vary the terms of, or defeat the operation of, the bond,[42] although such evidence is admissible to explain a mistake in the recital of a bond.[43]

Where a bond has been properly filed and afterward lost, a copy preserved among plaintiff's papers may be admitted in evidence,[44] or an entry on the docket of the court in respect of the bond may be shown.[45]

Weight and sufficiency. The general rules as to evidence in civil actions have been applied in determining that the evidence in actions on forthcoming or dissolution bonds was sufficient to establish such matters as filing of an affidavit for attachment,[46] delivery of bond,[47] absence of alteration of bond,[48] release of attached property,[49] value of attached property,[50] insolvency of attachment defendant at time of levy,[51] or ownership of attachment judgment,[52] or that it was insufficient to establish such matters as want of consideration,[53] or abandonment of the attachment[54]

An assessment of the value of the property in and by the judgment as required by statute is conclusive on the obligors on a forthcoming bond,[55] as is also an execution sale following the attachment,[56] and it has been held that, where the liability of the obligors is for the decrease in the value of goods between the date of their release and the date of their redelivery, the sum for which the property is sold at sheriff's sale is conclusive of its value.[57]

It is not necessary to introduce the writ of attachment itself in evidence in an action on a forthcoming or discharged bond which recites the attachment and the levy thereunder,[58] or to introduce the judgment in the attachment suit in evidence where the fieri facias issued thereon, with a nulla bona return, and showing the amount of the judgment, is introduced.[59]

The judgment in the attachment suit is conclusive unless assailed for fraud or mistake, against the sureties in the undertaking that defendant will perform the judgment of the court given to secure the restoration of the attached property to defendant.[60] Where, however, a judgment has been entered on an amended statement of claim in foreign attachment proceedings, the judgment is not conclusive on the surety's liability[61]

A recital in the bond sued on as to the value of the property is certainly prima facie evidence of its value,[62] and there is authority for the view that such a recital is conclusive on the question of value.[63]

The officer's return of failure to deliver property attached and released on delivery bond, indorsed on a special execution, has been held conclusive against the sureties in an action on the bond.[64]

h. Trial

Rules governing trials generally are applicable to actions on redelivery or dissolution bonds.

Jury issues under a plea in abatement should be submitted before the trial of the case on the merits.[65]

The general rule is that, where the facts are undisputed, the effect thereof is a question for the court,[66] and, where the evidence on any issue is insufficient to warrant submission thereof to the

What constitutes fraud

(1) Sureties on a bond to dissolve an attachment must prove that the judgment was improper, either because the principals were not indebted to plaintiffs, or because the amount for which judgment was rendered was grossly exaggerated for the purpose of defrauding the sureties, in order to impeach the judgment rendered against the principals on the bond.—Martiniello v. Robitaille, (Mass.) 199 N.E 534

(2) Evidence of negotiations between obligees and principals on a bond to dissolve an attachment for entry of proper judgment, which did not culminate in an enforceable agreement, and that judgment was entered by default, did not show fraud relieving sureties from liability for nonpayment of alleged excessive judgment rendered against the principals.—Martiniello v. Robitaille, supra

(3) Evidence that one obligee and one principal on a bond to dissolve an attachment agreed on entry of judgment, but that judgment was entered by default, was insufficient showing of collusion between obligees and principals and did not relieve sureties from liability for nonpayment of judgment actually rendered.—Martiniello v. Robitaille, supra.

(4) In an action against sureties on a bond to dissolve an attachment, evidence of agreement between one of obligees of bond and one principal that obligee would not bring suit against sureties for two years if principal would give him judgment for four thousand dollars, and that obligees obtained judgment by default in a sum in excess of eight thousand dollars, was insufficient to impeach the judgment on the ground of fraud and collusion.—Martiniello v. Robitaille, supra.

66. Liability of surety
Where the facts are undisputed, the liability of the surety is a question of law.—Burns Bros. v. Block, (Mass.) 198 N.E 164.

Reasonable time
(1) The question of a reasonable time in which to redeliver is a question for the court where the facts are undisputed.—Lastowski v Lawnicki, 179 A. 266, 115 N.J.Law 230.

(2) Whether a debtor accepted a perpetual stay of execution within a reasonable time is a question of law.—Pue v. Wheeler, 255 P. 1043, 78 Mont. 516, certiorari denied and error dismissed Wheeler v Pue, 48 S.Ct. 19, 275 U.S. 483, 72 L.Ed. 385.

Insolvency
As regards liability of sureties on a bond to release an attachment where proceedings in bankruptcy were filed against the attachment defendant within four months after levy, the fact that much of the evidence as to the value of attachment defendant's property at the time of levy was opinion evidence did not require submission of the question of insolvency to the jury, where other facts corroborated the opinion evidence.—Nicolai-Neppach Co. v Smith, (Or.) 58 P.(2d) 1016, adhered to 60 P.(2d) 979.

jury, or where the facts are admitted, the court may direct a verdict on that issue.[67]

If the evidence is conflicting, it is ordinarily the province of the jury to determine the issues, and the court should instruct the jury clearly on the law applicable where so requested.[68]

A finding that the principal is not discharged, where the issue is whether the surety is discharged, does not dispose of the issues.[69] Judgment cannot be entered on a bond in a jury case where defendant defaults unless the jury have found the value of the property attached,[70] although in a case tried without intervention of a jury it is sufficient that the court find the value of such property.[71] The court need not make a finding as to the value of replevied property where the attaching officer has estimated the value when the bond was given.[72]

i. Judgment

The judgment on a redelivery or dissolution bond should follow the statute and conform to the terms of the bond

In an action on a release or forthcoming bond, judgment should be entered in accordance with the terms of the bond.[73] A statutory judgment forfeiting the bond must strictly follow the substance of the statute. For the purposes of such judgment, the description of the parties as given in the bond is a matter of substance, identifying the bond with the writ and the judgment of condemnation.[74]

The court is authorized to render judgment for the penalty of such bond, but to be satisfied by the payment of the value of the property, with interest from the date of the bond, or by payment of plaintiff's demand, with interest or costs, or by the forthcoming of the property according to the tenor of the bond,[75] but a judgment on a dissolution bond is ordinarily for the amount of the judgment in the original action with interest, and a condition therein that it may be satisfied by a redelivery of the attached property, as though it were a judgment on a redelivery bond, is unnecessary.[76] Judgment against sureties on a replevy bond is properly for the value of the property as estimated by the sheriff when the bond was given, together with interest, in accordance with the direction of the statute.[77]

A statute requiring a judgment against principal and surety to recite the order of their liability, so that their property may be exhausted in such order by the officer having the execution, has been held not applicable to a judgment on a bond to discharge an attachment.[78]

67. A M Wilson & Co. v. Sims, 87 S E 890, 144 Ga 685

Facts admitted

Where the surety admits execution of the bond and the judgment is properly proved, the court may direct a verdict for the obligee where no competent evidence of any defense has been introduced.—Rice v Rosenberg, 178 N E 724, 277 Mass 334

The court must direct verdict on defense not supported by evidence.—O'Byrne v McCormick, (Mo App) 92 S W (2d) 1005

Submission to jury held not prejudicial.—Waverly Lumber Co. v Piantedosi, 160 N E 268, 262 Mass. 377

68. Fraud

The court should instruct the jury that the evidence to maintain a defense of fraud and misrepresentation should be clear and satisfactory, and the usual instruction that a preponderance of the evidence will defeat recovery is insufficient, where a more precise statement is requested.—Fritts v Reidel, 165 P. 671, 101 Kan 68

Condition of property

(1) Where goods retained by defendants under an attachment bond were returned to the sheriff and sold, and plaintiff brought an action on the redelivery bond for diminution in their value, an instruction that, if plaintiff inspected the property prior to its redelivery, and after such inspection made a demand for its return, without objecting to its quality or quantity, and the proper officer advertised it and sold it to plaintiff, and defendants were thereby misled and prevented from taking steps to protect themselves by electing to pay its value, plaintiff was estopped from asserting that the property was injured was erroneous.—Creswell v Woodside, 63 P 330, 15 Colo App 468

(2) It was proper to refuse a requested instruction that, if the goods, when redelivered, were not substantially in the same condition as when released, plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for a certain amount, where there was no evidence that the diminution in value of the goods between the time of release and of redelivery was such amount.—Creswell v Woodside, supra

69. Issue of discharge by payment

In an action on a bond substituted for an attachment in an action for personal injuries and conditioned for the payment of two thousand five hundred dollars on any judgment recovered, in which the surety pleaded a payment by an insurer against liability, and plaintiff filed a reply, alleging that the payment was pursuant to a policy of insurance in discharge of insurer's own liability, the court's conclusion thereon that the payment did not completely satisfy the judgment and did not discharge the principal in the bond was held not to dispose of the issue, which was whether the surety was released by the payment by the insurance company.—O'Connor v. Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co., 115 A. 484, 97 Conn 8.

In Maine, in an action on a bond given to obtain the release of an attachment, judgment may be entered for the penal sum of the bond, but the penalty may be chancered and execution issued for the amount remaining due on the judgment in the suit in which the bond was given including costs, etc.—Waterhouse v. 77. Wells v Cloud, (Tex Civ App) 202 S W 331

78. Andres v Schlueter, 118 N W 429, 140 Iowa 389.

Where agents, sued for broker's compensation, individually and as agents and trustees, executed a bond to secure the release of their principal's property from injunction and attachment writs, it was not necessary for the decree to show in what capacity they were held liable.[79]

On death of defendant, his heirs at law substituted as parties, although nonresidents, are bound by a judgment in rem holding the property subject to execution, although no personal judgment can be entered for want of appearance.[80]

A judgment on a bond in replevin of attached property reciting that, after replevy, defendant in attachment appropriated the property to his own use shows that there was no abandonment of the attachment proceedings.[81]

j. Amount of Recovery

The measure of the recovery on a forthcoming or dissolution bond is dependent on the terms of the bond and of the statute under which it is given.

The measure of recovery on a bond for the release of attached property depends on the terms and conditions of the instrument, or of the statute by which such liability is fixed.[82]

Under a bond conditioned to return the property in case judgment shall be rendered against defendant in the attachment suit, the liability of the obligors is for the value of the goods released and not for the amount of the money judgment against defendant.[83]

Where the bond is conditioned for the return of the property or the satisfaction of the judgment, the measure of the surety's liability is the amount of the judgment where not in excess of the value of the property released,[84] but, if such property is of less value than the amount of the judgment, the recovery is limited to its value.[85] Stated in other terms, the liability is for the value of the property not in excess of the amount of the judgment.[86]

Where the bond is conditioned for the return of the goods or the payment of a specific sum of money, a recovery may be had up to the amount of the penalty of the bond, although in excess of the actual value of the unreturned goods, if not in excess of the judgment obtained in the attachment proceedings,[87] but, if the undertaking is conditioned for the payment of the value of the property, not exceeding a certain sum, the liability is limited to the value of the property and cannot be extended to the sum named, or to include the liability of defendant in the suit.[88]

Where the bond is in a fixed penalty and is conditioned to have the property forthcoming to answer to the order or decree of the court, the obligors

Actual value of debtor's interest in property

(1) The surety on an attachment redelivery bond, conditioned, as required by statute, on the payment of the judgment or of the value of defendant's interest in the attached property, is liable only to the extent of the actual value of defendant's interest in the property released by the bond.—Sunderlin v. Terry, 112 A. 642, 95 Conn. 713.—6 C.J. p. 360 notes 66 [b], 69.

(2) "Actual value," as used in a bond given pursuant to Gen.St.(1918) § 5888, to release attachment of personalty, and in which principal and surety agreed to pay actual value of interest of debtor in property attached, means the fair market value and not what the property would bring at execution sale.—Safford v. McNeil, 129 A. 721, 102 Conn. 684.

(3) Actual value of interest of debtor in attached property, which he and surety agree to pay by bond, means interest in the property actually taken by attachment undiminished by chattel mortgage, which is invalid as against attaching creditor.—Safford v. McNeil, supra.

Property subject to prior lien

(1) Where the surety in a forthcoming bond shows that the property attached is subject to a mortgage, he is liable, in the event of a recovery by plaintiff against defendant in the attachment suit, only for the value of defendant's equity in the property.—Halbert v. McCulloch, 3 Metc.(Ky.) 456, 79 Am.D. 556

(2) Where mortgage lien on property existed at time of attachment, judgment for value of the property at the time of attachment is error, since attachment was subject to mortgage lien and the proper measure of recovery was value at time of attachment, less amount of mortgage lien.—U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co. v. McHargue, 97 S.W.(2d) 831, 265 Ky. 813

are liable to the extent of the penalty, and the obligee may recover the value of the property if not in excess of the balance due on the decree or the amount of the penalty of the bond.[89]

In the case of a bond conditioned to satisfy any judgment recovered against the attachment defendant, the judgment fixes the amount to be recovered under the bond, although exceeding the value of the property up to the amount of the penalty,[90] with interest.[91] In the case of a bond in a fixed amount conditioned to pay the judgment, the obligors cannot be held to a sum in excess of the amount of the judgment.[92]

In any event, the sureties are not liable in excess of the amount fixed in the bond.[93]

Where a surety on a bond to discharge an attachment was entitled to subrogation to the right of the principal debtor to deduction for collection on certain collateral, the judgment should be for the penal sum of the bond, but execution should issue only for the amount of the debt and costs, after deducting the amounts under the right of subrogation.[94]

Time as of which value to be computed When the value of the property is the measure of damages, the amount recoverable is the value at the time of the seizure under the attachment, or at the time at which the property should have been delivered under the condition of the bond.[95]

How value determined. The value is to be found by the court or jury trying the case[96]

Depreciation in value. Where the property when returned by defendant is of less value than when received by him, by reason of use or neglect on his part, plaintiff in the action may recover of the obligors the difference between the value at the time of the redelivery and at the time it was released from the attachment.[97] Where, however, the bond was conditioned that defendant should pay the debt, etc, or the value of the property, or should deliver the property when so ordered, and the court decreed a return and sale of the property pending the suit, because of its perishable nature, after the property had been used by defendant, it was held that the sureties were not liable for any difference between the amount realized at the sale and the valuation of the property fixed in the bond.[98]

Interest. A recovery on the bond may include interest from the time of a breach until the date of the judgment in the action on the bond.[99] Where the bond is to pay the amount of any judgment which may be recovered against the attachment defendant not exceeding a stated sum with interest and costs, the sureties are not bound to pay interest on plaintiff's claim but their liability is to interest on the judgment[1] A statute providing for judgment on a forthcoming bond in attachment for the value of the property, and, if that value exceeds the amount due on execution, for the amount due and twenty per cent damages, does not authorize judgment for interest on the value.[2]

Costs. On an unsuccessful appeal by the obligors, costs on both the attachment proceeding and on the delivery bond obligating them to pay the amount of the judgment and costs may be awarded against the surety.[3]

E. SALE AND DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY OR PROCEEDS

§ 318. Sale in General

Attached property cannot ordinarily be sold by the attaching officer before judgment unless statutes so provide; and in any case a greater interest than that of the debtor cannot be sold.

Ordinarily, in the absence of statute, an attachment is no justification to the officer in selling the property, unless sold under execution issued upon judgment.[4] In any case an attaching creditor cannot subject to sale in satisfaction of his claim a greater interest in property than that owned by his debtor.[5]

§ 319. —— Where Property Perishable, Liable to Depreciation, or Expensive to Keep Attached property may, in some states, be sold before final judgment if it is perishable, liable to depreciation, or expensive to keep.

In some states, under statutes authorizing the proceedings, it is held that attached property may be sold before final judgment in the attachment suit either under an order of court obtained for that purpose or by the officer upon his own responsibility upon a showing made that the case is within the statute, where the property is of a perishable nature,[6] or when, by reason of its liability to great depreciation in value or of the expense incident to keeping it to await the determination of the action, the interests of the parties require that it shall be converted into cash;[7] and in the latter case the court should order a sale regardless of whether or not the property was perishable.[8] The action of the court in ordering a sale rests in its sound discretion, and such a sale will not be disturbed in the absence of a showing of abuse thereof,[9] but a sale should not be ordered where the creditor has attached ample property to satisfy his claim and where great loss may be sustained if a sale should take place.[10] The fact that defendants in attachment have no interest in the property does not affect the authority of the court to order a sale of whatever interest, if any, defendants have.[11]

§ 320. —— Nature and Effect of Sale

A sale before judgment does not alter the rights of the parties, but the proceeds are substituted for the property.

A sale under statutes providing for the sale of attached property in limine or before final judgment is an equitable remedy provided for the convenience of the parties and preservation of the property.[12] The object of the statutes is to confide a power to be used for the benefit of both parties,[13] and the rights of the parties are not intended to be altered thereby, but imperishable money requiring no expense to keep is substituted in the possession of the court or officer for perishable property or property expensive to keep.[14]

Where the officer sells on mesne process a part of attached property, realizing thereby a sufficient amount to satisfy the debt for the recovery of which the attachment was issued, plaintiff's lien on the remainder will not be thereby dissolved, although the sheriff may be liable for attaching too much.[15]

The proceeds take the place of the property and continue subject to the right of defendant to have it delivered to him on giving bond, unless he has waived the right by an agreement that the proceeds shall remain in hands of the sheriff subject to the rights of the attaching creditors, until the further order of the court.[16]

Ordinarily the correctness of an order for the sale of attached property before judgment, or determining the propriety of such sale, will not be reviewed, nothing appearing affirmatively to impeach it, but the propriety thereof will be presumed —McCreery v. The sale does not defeat or displace a prior lien upon the property,[17] but the property is released from such lien which is transferred to the proceeds[18]

A sale of attached property is not vitiated by the fact that the officer illegally attaches the funds in his hands on a writ in favor of another creditor.[19]

§ 321. Sale after Replevy or Dissolution of Attachment

After replevy of attached property or dissolution of the attachment, there can be no sale.

Where the property attached has been replevied or the attachment discharged or dissolved, a sale of the property cannot thereafter be ordered or made because of its perishable nature, or liability to depreciation or the expense of keeping it.[20]

§ 322. Sale by Consent

A sale of the attached property may be made by the parties' consent which, in the absence of consideration, is revocable.

A sale of attached property may be made by the officer by consent of the parties interested,[21] and it is not necessary in such case that all the steps ordinarily required by statute be pursued.[22] So although a sale, proceeding under a statute, is void thereunder if the statutory requirements have not been complied with, where defendant was present and did not object thereto but made a bid on the property, the sale must be considered as valid, as having been made by consent.[23]

A sale by consent is the official act of the officer, and the proceeds are held under the attachment in the place of the property.[24]

If there is no consideration for the agreement of the owner of the attached property with the creditor or the levying officer that the property may be sold by them in such manner as they may choose, such license may be revoked at any time before a sale is made thereunder.[25]

§ 323. Duty of Officer to Sell

A regular order to sell imposes a duty on the officer.

Where the order for the sale of attached property is regularly issued, the officer must sell.[26]

§ 324. Proceedings

a In general
b Setting aside sale

a. In General

The proceedings on the sale must strictly comply with the governing statutes

The proceedings upon the sale of attached property should be in strict compliance with the statute governing the matter.[27] Where the statute requires that the question of whether the property is liable to perish or waste be determined by appraisers who must, after so determining, appraise the property, the officers cannot legally sell the property until after such determination.[28] Where a statute requires plaintiff obtaining a default decree without the appearance of an absent debtor to furnish a refunding bond before any proceedings to satisfy the decree be had, a sale made without such bond being given is void[29] A sale is not void, however, because of the failure of the order or attachment to run in the name of the state when the order of sale ran in the name of the state and defendants were regularly served or appeared and made no objection to the judgment sustaining the attachment.[30]

In determining whether an ordinary judgment only should be rendered for plaintiff or whether the attached property should be ordered sold, issues arising on denial of the facts alleged in the affidavit for attachment are for the jury, while the question as to whether the property was attached and the propriety of the attachment is for the court; and evidence as to whether the attached property should be sold is admissible, although offered after verdict and in the absence of the jury.[31] Under some statutes, the sale of attached lands under an order of the court is governed by the same restrictions and regulations as though the land had been levied on under execution.[32] Where the order of sale is made subsequent to the entry of a judgment for plaintiff, it is not necessary then to hear evidence as to the validity of the grounds of the attachment when that matter has been fully heard on a motion to dissolve.[33]

Property delivered under forthcoming bond. Under a statute providing that where property taken in attachment has been delivered to defendant under the provisions of a forthcoming bond the court may compel its delivery to the officer for sale, where a judgment has been rendered for plaintiff the proper procedure is for the court to make an order for the delivery of the property to the officer for sale and to make an order for the sale.[34]

Conveyance of property. A requirement that where a claim for purchase money has been reduced to judgment by the payee retaining title in the attached property he shall before sale convey the property to the debtor does not apply to a sale under short order; and in the latter case the sale is valid although no conveyance is made, such conveyance being necessary only in case of a regular sale under final process.[35]

Optional proceedings. Although a statute requires the sheriff to sell attached perishable property before judgment without a court order, a party desiring such a sale may proceed to obtain a court order therefor under a statute authorizing such an order where it appears that the interests of the parties will be subserved by a sale.[36]

Levy and appraisement. Where judgment is rendered for the attachment plaintiff, the original levy on the writ of attachment and the confirmation thereof by the court renders it wholly unnecessary to levy on the attached real property after the issue of the order of sale, and the sheriff proceeds as if the property had been levied on by execution. Accordingly, where appraisement is required by statute before sale, it is held that he may call an inquest at any time after the order of sale is delivered to him and before the sale.[37] A sale may be set aside even after confirmation, however, where it is void for want of further appraisal required by statute.[38]

b. Setting Aside Sale

In a proper case a sale of attached property may be set aside on motion or rule to show cause or in a separate equitable action instituted for the purpose.

Where proper grounds for setting aside the sale exists, as where there was a noncompliance with the requirements outlined in §§ 324–332 of this article, the court ordering a sale of attached property has the same power to set aside a sale made thereunder as it would have if the sale had been made by virtue of an execution issued on a judgment entered in an action at common law, the proper procedure being by rule to show cause[39] or motion,[40] and a sale of attached property after final judgment may be set aside in an equitable action based on the ground that the attachment and judgment were obtained on a false and fraudulent affidavit without notice to the attachment defendant.[41] Where more land is sold than was necessary to pay the amount the debtor owed, the sale should be set aside on equitable terms, giving the purchaser a lien on the land for all the money he has paid out therefor.[42]

§ 325. —— Order of Sale

A court order made in accordance with the requirements of the statute is necessary for the sale of attached property before judgment under statutes permitting sale by order.

Where the statute permits the sale of property before judgment by order of court, the levying officer has no right to sell without such order.[43] An order of sale of attached property may be made subsequent to the entry of judgment for the attaching creditor,[44] and it has been held timely if made at the

Questions raised by motion

A motion to set aside a sale on attachment because the petition was insufficient to support the judgment raised the validity of an attachment based solely on a verified petition.—Kengreen Gas Utilities Corporation v Crozer, 51 S W (2d) 262, 244 Ky. 440.

next term thereafter.[45] Since an order of sale of attached property issued by the court clerk after judgment for the creditor must conform to the judgment or order of the court, the clerk is without jurisdiction to issue the order where there is no judgment or order of the court for the sale[46] Where a sale made under a default judgment was set aside after the judgment was vacated, on rendering a second wrongful default judgment a court is without power or authority to reinstate and approve the sale previously made.[47]

Where two attachments issue out of different courts, the court from which the last writ issued may, before judgment, in the interest of all the parties, order a sale of property levied on under both writs, but it has no power to interfere with the rights of the first attaching creditor in the proceeds[48]

It is sometimes required that an order for the sale of attached property before judgment must be predicated upon a sworn application by the levying officer showing the character of the property claimed to be perishable and the amount thereof[49] An attaching creditor who has applied for an order for a sale of property levied on may withdraw such application without thereby dissolving the attachment.[50]

Requisites and sufficiency. It is not necessary that the order should show the facts which authorize the sale of the property or the making of the order[51] However, a judicial sale of attached real estate sold by order of the judgment is void where no specific description of the property is included in the judgment.[52]

The order of sale must satisfy the statutory requirements as to advertising the sale, and should not improperly require prospective bidders to deposit a stated sum before the sale[53] Where the order of sale does not satisfy the statutory requirements or improperly requires prospective bidders to deposit a stated sum before the sale, the sale may be set aside on proper motion even though such requirement was ignored by the officer conducting the sale.[54]

Where superior lienholders are not seeking a sale, the court does not abuse its discretion by requiring an attaching creditor, who has been adjudged fourth lien on the property, to execute a bond for costs before ordering the property sold.[55]

An order issued by the court clerk after judgment for the creditor must conform to the judgment or order of the court.[56]

Nature and effect. An order of sale of attached property after judgment for the creditor is a species of execution.[57] An order for the sale before judgment of perishable property attached does not affect the legality of the original seizure.[58]

Attack on order If no jurisdiction was acquired over the subject matter of the levy, the order of sale may be set aside at any time and in any appropriate action, in which all the parties to the judgment should be made parties.[59] So where attached property has been sold under a judgment or order therefor which the court had no jurisdiction to render, the attachment defendant is not bound to appeal to save his rights, but may have the judgment set aside upon motion.[60]

The order directing attached property to be sold cannot, however, be collaterally attacked for the purpose of defeating the title of the purchaser at the sale,[61] or for mere irregularities curable by amendment[62]

§ 326. —— Notice of Appraisal and Sale

Notice of appraisal and sale should be given in accordance with the statutory requirements.

Since a resort to the proceeding of sale after appraisal is warranted only by specific statutory law, in order to be justified notice of appraisal and sale should be given as required by the statute, otherwise the sale will be illegal;[63] and it has been held that although the statute does not provide when notice of application for examination, appraisal, and sale of attached property shall be given, except that it shall be at least a stated time before sale, it must be given a reasonable time before the appraisers act, so that the parties may have an opportunity to be present, notwithstanding that the statute is silent as to any hearing by appraisers.[64]

Where the statute authorizes an order for immediate sale only after notice to the adverse party, the notice must be given to the defendant owning the property; and notice to a defendant having no interest therein is not sufficient.[65]

A notice of sale, which is defective for want of sufficient time, cannot be cured by a postponement of the sale on the day appointed therefor to a day remote enough to satisfy the statutory requirement as to notice.[66]

Where a judicial sale under attachment proceedings was advertised in a publication which was not a newspaper for that purpose, the irregularity is such an informality as is cured by prescription, precluding an attack on the sale more than two years thereafter.[67]

Where the property is subject to a mortgage, a sale should not, it has been held, be made without a previous warning order to the mortgagee.[68]

§ 327. —— Time of Sale

The sale should be made at the time prescribed by statute or order.

The sale of attached property should be made at the time prescribed by the statute[69] or ordered by the court.[70]

§ 328. —— Terms, and Mode and Conduct of Sale

The terms and conduct of the sale must conform to statutory requirements where such exist; in other respects they are largely discretionary.

In matters not regulated by statute or the order or decree, the sale is generally under the control of the officer conducting it, and he has considerable discretion in the actual conduct of the sale.[71] Where the statute requires the sale to be public, a private sale is unauthorized, and will, it has been held, have the effect of postponing the lien of the creditor effecting it to those subsequently attaching creditors.[72] It is not essential that the sale should be for cash;[73] but when the terms of sale of attached property do not conform to the statutory rules regarding the time for which credit may be given, the sale should be set aside.[74] When an officer sells goods he becomes liable from the time of the sale for the price at which they are sold, and cannot set up, in defense to an action for it, that he never received the money or its equivalent, when he has no right to sell for anything but money.[75]

Although the statute provided for the sale of attached property by the sheriff on judgment for plaintiff, defendant could not complain where a court treated an action for the breach of a warranty in a deed as one in equity and ordered a sale of the attached property by a commissioner, since, having the right to object if the property did not bring a fair price, he could not be harmed.[76]

Sale of original security first Where the debt on which the action is brought was secured, the owner of the attached property can, it has been held, require the officer to sell the original security before putting up the attached property.[77]

Opportunity to redeem. In decreeing a sale of real estate to satisfy the lien of an attachment thereon, it has been held that the debtor should be given a reasonable time to redeem by paying the amount decreed against him.[78]

§ 329. —— Sale of Part of Property

Only so much of the property as is required to pay the amount due or as is levied on should be sold.

It is the duty of the sheriff on the final process to sell no more of the property than may be required to pay the amount due, including the costs,[79] and an order directing the sale of several lots of realty is improper in the absence of evidence showing that the lots should or must be sold together [80] Where the levy is upon a particular interest only, that interest alone should be sold,[81] but a sale after appraisal is not illegal by reason of the fact that more than enough to realize the amount called for by the precept is sold, where the last article sold was indivisible, and previous to its sale the necessary amount had not been realized.[82]

§ 330. —— Sale of Real Estate

Real estate should not be sold unless other property is insufficient to satisfy the debt, and in some jurisdictions cannot be sold without an action to enforce the lien.

A sale of real estate which has been attached cannot be ordered until all the personal property attached has been sold,[83] and where personalty has been sold for the full amount of plaintiff's debt, a subsequent sale of attached realty is void [84] So, where a defendant has deposited in court the amount of the debt, land attached should not be ordered sold for the payment of the debt. The fund in court should be first disposed of, and, if insufficient, a sale of the land may then be ordered.[85] Where the equitable interest of a debtor in land in which there is no defect of title is to be sold on credit, the land should be made subject to the payment of the purchase money.[86]

In West Virginia an action at law or in equity must be instituted to enforce the lien acquired in attachment proceedings [87]

§ 331. —— Indemnity Bond

The officer cannot refuse to execute a regular order of sale because plaintiff does not give an indemnity bond, but where such bond is required, a sale without one is invalid.

Where an order of sale is regularly issued, the officer is bound to sell, although title to the property is disputed, and he cannot refuse to proceed because plaintiff does not give an indemnity bond [88] Some statutes, however, require an indemnity bond before sale in cases against nonresidents, or where defendant has been constructively summoned and has not appeared, in order to secure him if he should appear and successfully defend within a certain time; and a sale without such bond having been executed is invalid and will be set aside.[89]

§ 332. —— Return and Confirmation

Where statutes require confirmation, a sale is incomplete until reported and, notwithstanding objections thereto, confirmed.

It is sometimes required by statute that a sale of attached property shall be returned or reported to the court and confirmed, in which case, until this is done, the sale remains incomplete,[90] passes no title to the purchaser,[91] cannot be enforced by either party,[92] and may be set aside.[93] The order of confirmation has been held a matter of right, however, and not of discretion, and its omission is immaterial after expiration of the time within which the attachment defendants are entitled to appear in order to set aside the sale.[94]

Exceptions or objections to the report of the sale may ordinarily be made and heard before confirmation;[95] but defendant who has procured a modification of the terms of sale with which the purchaser in good faith complied is estopped to object to its confirmation; nor will confirmation be denied on the ground of gross inadequacy of the purchase price on the testimony of a witness as to the value at a

Amended exceptions

A purchaser, excepting to the report of an attachment sale on the ground that the amount of a street improvement lien was not credited on his purchase price, is entitled to file amended exceptions setting up a sale of property to satisfy such lien, and to introduce proof on the question whether the master commissioner announced that he was selling the property subject to the lien, which was not referred to in the decree ordering the attachment sale; and his amended exceptions were offered in time when offered before the court acted on such liens where the original exception, alleging their existence, was filed before confirmation of the sale, although not within the time granted for exceptions, and the amendments presented no new exceptions, but merely made the motion definite—Appleman v. Lynch Nat. Bank, 298 S W. 1097, 221 Ky. 415.

subsequent time when conditions had changed.[96] After a sale has been reported to and confirmed by the chancellor, he has no power at a subsequent term to hear exceptions or to permit, without consent, the commissioner to amend his report.[97]

§ 333. —— Recovery of Purchase Money

Where a cause of action therefor exists, the selling officer can recover the purchase price by suit.

Ordinarily an officer selling property under an attachment may, if necessary, sue to recover the purchase price,[98] but where, under a sale by consent of all the parties, a creditor purchases a part of the property, in amount less than his debt, to satisfaction of which he is entitled under the agreement, the officer cannot maintain an action against him for the purchase price.[99]

§ 334. Title, Rights, and Liabilities of Purchaser

The purchaser at a valid sale of attached property acquires the title which defendant had therein at the time of the levy, and in the case of goods sold as perishable he takes good title even though defendant had none. He is liable for torts committed by him in connection with the sale but may recover from the creditor money paid for property he is required to surrender.

A sale of property under an attachment passes all of the attachment defendant's interest therein,[1] subject, in some jurisdictions, to the right of redemption,[2] and entitles the purchaser to possession.[3] The sale relates back to the levy and divests the debtor of the title which he had at the date of the levy and invests such title in the purchaser.[4]

Ordinarily, the purchaser acquires only defendant's interest in the property, however,[5] unless he can show himself entitled to the full protection afforded a bona fide purchaser for value without notice,[6] and where an attaching creditor has constructive notice of an encumbrance on property sold pursuant to a foreclosure of his attachment lien, the purchaser acquires only a qualified interest in the property, taking the legal title subject to the mortgage debt.[7] So, where there has been a sale of attached property under circumstances amounting to notice to the purchaser of the debtor's right to open the judgment, the purchaser will be held to purchase

Evidence held insufficient

Testimony of a witness, at a subsequent time when conditions had changed and land had advanced in price, that he would give ten thousand dollars for an interest in attached lands sold for seven thousand dollars, was insufficient to show that the property was sold for a grossly inadequate price particularly where the witness was an unsuccessful bidder at the sale.—Hilliard v Union Trust Co of New Jersey, 97 S E. 335, 123 Va. 724.

Priority over subsequent sale

Sale to innocent purchaser

A sale of land to an innocent purchaser after the payment of the purchase money and obtaining the title by deed will not, under some statutes dealing with the rights of such purchasers, be set aside even though a former judgment in the attachment proceedings has been reversed.—Beasley v. Sale of pledged note

Where a note was pledged to a bank by the payee named therein, without indorsement, as collateral security for the payee's note, and the bank sold the pledged note in attachment proceedings, the purchaser became vested merely with the rights of the pledgor and of the pledgee—Citizens' Bank & Trust Co. v. Facts showing no bona fide purchase

As a general rule, one who purchases the legal title with notice of an outstanding equitable title of heirs of the deceased member of the community, or notice of facts putting him on inquiry as to such title, does not take as a bona fide purchaser free from the equitable claims of the owners of the community. Accordingly, where a deed of trust was given by a married man joined by his second wife, creating a lien in favor of the beneficiary in the deed of trust as against both the interest of the married man and of an heir of the first marriage, and a creditor of the married man subsequently acquired by attachment his interest, the attaching creditor was not a bona fide purchaser, where at the time he acquired title under the attachment sale he was notified by public outcry of the interest of the heir, particularly where he had advanced no new consideration nor surrendered any security for the land. In such case the purchaser takes subject to the rights of the heir—Shear Co v Stuth, (Tex Civ App) 248 S W. 158

7. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v First Nat. Bank, (Tex Civ. App) 33 S.W (2d) 605, error refused.

subject to that right [8]

Where an attachment or an attachment judgment is void, a sale thereunder is also void and the purchaser acquires no title [9]

A plaintiff who causes an attachment to issue and causes property to be sold not belonging to defendant, which property the purchaser is required to surrender, is liable to such purchaser for the money paid for such property.[10]

Sale of property as perishable. An order of sale of property as perishable and sale under such order will confer a good title on the purchaser[11] without regard to the title or interest of defendant in attachment and notwithstanding the property may have belonged to another or may have been burdened with other claims;[12] and persons claiming the property, or any interest therein adverse to the attachment defendant, must look to the proceeds of the sale in asserting their rights [13]

Liabilities. A mere purchaser who does nothing more than purchase, is not responsible in trespass for the wrongful act of the sheriff in levying on and selling the goods; but a purchaser who takes possession of the property is liable in trespass if the attachment defendant had no title, the wrong in such case being not the illegal seizure by the sheriff, but the subsequent act of the purchaser [14]

Where on the sale of attached property attaching plaintiff agreed with defendant to buy the property to satisfy his debt out of the proceeds thereof and to return the balance to the debtor, it was held that this constituted a secret trust in favor of the debtor, and that attaching plaintiff was liable to other creditors of defendant for the surplus of the proceeds over the amount necessary to satisfy his claim.[15]

If the purchaser at a sale of property under mesne process pays the price to the creditor whose recovery is sufficient to absorb the whole of such proceeds, the purchaser will be discharged unless the officer holds paramount claims on such proceeds.[16]

§ 335. Disposition of Proceeds or Property

a In general
b Before judgment
c. After judgment
d On dissolution, release, or payment
e Interest on proceeds

a. In General

The proceeds of property sold in attachment should be distributed to the parties entitled, all interested parties being given an opportunity to assert their claims and object to the order of distribution.

As shown in the following sections, the proceeds of the sale of attached property are to be distributed according to the outcome of the litigation to the parties entitled thereto. Defendant should have notice of the order of distribution,[17] and any person claiming an interest in the attached property should be given an opportunity to assert his claims before final distribution.[18] Accordingly, the alleged debtor whose property was sold may become a party to a money rule against the sheriff by an attaching creditor, and may plead that the creditor has no valid lien on the fund in the sheriff's hands,[19] but a creditor who has been paid in full has no right to complaint of the order of distribution,[20] and neither has a subsequent grantee of defendant in attachment, where the proceeds were insufficient to satisfy all creditors entitled to share therein.[21]

Order for assessment. A statute providing that the court shall direct the clerk to make an assessment of the amount to which each attaching creditor is entitled out of the property attached does not make an order necessary where the judge of the court is ex officio the clerk thereof.[22]

b. Before Judgment

The proceeds of a sale before judgment are to be held until judgment and order for distribution.

The proceeds of a sale of attached property, when the sale thereof is made before judgment, are to be held, to be disposed of in like manner as the property would have been held and disposed of if it had remained unsold,[23] and should not be distributed before judgment and order for such distribution.[24] Furthermore, in case of dispute as to the ownership of attached property, the court should not order the proceeds of a sale of such property to be paid over to plaintiff in attachment until the question of ownership has been determined.[25] Where, by agreement of the parties, the proceeds were deposited with a third party who subsequently intervened in the action setting up an adverse claim, the court has power to require payment thereof to a commissioner appointed by the court.[26]

c. After Judgment

The proceeds of the sale of attached property should be distributed according to the priority of the claims thereto or prorated under statutes providing therefor.

Where the proceeds of the sale of attached property are claimed by several creditors, they will be distributed among the creditors in the order of their priority as determined by the court.[27] A creditor under whose writ property could not be seized because it was held by an officer of another jurisdiction, under another writ, may intervene in the suit in which the attachment was made and share in the distribution of the proceeds remaining after satisfying the first attachment,[28] and a mortgage lien perfected before the levy of a second attachment will be entitled to satisfaction out of the surplus proceeds of sale under a prior attachment.[29] Where a mortgagor assigns his equity of redemption after it is attached, and the officer afterward sells it on the attaching creditor's execution, which is satisfied by a part of the proceeds, and, having no notice of the assignment, applies the surplus in satisfaction of another attachment execution against the mortgagor, he is not answerable to the assignee for such surplus.[30]

In the absence of statutory provisions applicable to the particular case requiring another mode of distribution, as between several attachment creditors, the proceeds of the sale of attached property should be applied according to the priority of the attachment liens,[31] but it has been held that where an attachment is held void as to subsequently attaching creditors who have proved their claim and joined in a common suit for their mutual benefit, the court may distribute the fund among them pro rata instead of in the order of the liens of their respective attachments.[32]

Settlement of priorities

Third persons retaining attached property under a forthcoming bond could not legally pay the proceeds of the sale of the property over until settlement of the priorities of attaching creditors—McDonald v. Loewen, 130 S.W 52, 145 Mo App 49.

Deduction of "necessary charges"

Under a statute requiring the attaching officer to hold the proceeds of a sale before judgment subject to the attachment "after deducting the necessary charges," the "necessary charges" are the statutory fees to which the attaching officer and appraisers are entitled and the necessary expenses of keeper, labor, and advertising, of taking and preparing a schedule of the property to be sold, and a reasonable amount for services as auctioneer—In re Chebot, (D C.Mass) 288 F. 1006.

27. Claim for keeping

In a proceeding by foreign attachment it has been held that the home defendant, having property of the absent defendant in his possession, for the keeping of which the absent defendant was indebted to him, was entitled to have his claim first satisfied out of the property, as against the attaching creditor—Williamson v. Gayle, 7 Gratt (48 Va) 152

Lien for labor

Where personal property of the debtor has been sold under an attachment lien of equal dignity with a mortgage lien under which real property has been sold, a labor lien prior to both the attachment and mortgage lien should be satisfied pro rata from the proceeds of the realty and personalty—N L Curry Grocery Co. v Chinn Mineral Co., 1 S W (2d) 536, 222 Ky. 437.

Previous buyer

Where certain staves were attached and sold, a previous buyer of staves from the attachment defendant who had paid the seller more than the value of staves delivered under the contract is entitled on intervention in the attachment proceedings to a preferred lien on the proceeds of the staves to the extent of the overpayment—Early v Meadow, 133 S W 229, 168 Ky 800

Intervention under claim of ownership

Where a third party on the day of the sale intervenes under a claim of ownership and seeks to obtain a suspension of the sale and the dissolution of the attachment on the ground that the judgment debtor was not the owner of the property, it is error to direct that the proceeds of the sale be first applied in part to payment of plaintiff in intervention as a preferred creditor and next to payment of the debt of plaintiff in attachment—Regalado v Luchsinger, 1 Philippine 619, 1 Off Gaz 513

32. Craig v. California Vineyard Co., 46 P. 421, 30 Or. 43.

Provision is sometimes made by statute for a pro rata distribution of the proceeds of attached property among attaching or other creditors under certain circumstances, and where this is the case all attaching creditors who come within the terms of the statute fare equally, regardless of the order in which their attachments were issued, delivered to the officer, or levied.[33] Under such a statute an attaching creditor does not get an unqualified lien, but takes his lien subject to the provision that under the statutory conditions other creditors will be entitled to share in the proceeds of the attached property pro rata.[34]

Under a statute providing for pro rata sharing between the attaching creditor and creditors prosecuting their claims to final judgment within a stated time after notice of the attachment, it is not necessary for the creditor in the subsequent action to have an attachment issued or to intervene in the attachment suit in order to prorate in the proceeds of the property attached in the first action,[35] nor is he deprived of his right by the fact that he had a receiver appointed.[36] Where an attachment is obtained in two actions both of which were prosecuted to judgment for plaintiff, it is immaterial whether the property was sold under execution issued in the first or the last case, the fact that it was sold in the last case affects neither the validity of the sale nor the right to prorate in the proceeds.[37]

The sale of property as perishable does not affect the right of subsequently attaching creditors to participate in the proceeds.[38]

d. On Dissolution, Release, or Payment

The proceeds of a sale of attached property should be returned to defendant on dissolution or release of the attachment or payment of the debt.

The property held under an attachment or the proceeds thereof in case it has been sold should be returned to defendant where plaintiff voluntarily releases the attachment,[39] or where he succeeds in the action and defendant pays the judgment,[40] or where the attachment is dissolved,[41] or the lien thereof is lost.[42]

e. Interest on Proceeds

The party entitled to the proceeds is entitled to any interest produced thereby.

Where attached property becomes changed into money in the officer's hands and is invested by him so as to produce interest, such interest belongs to the party entitled to the money and not to the officer.[43]

F. PROCEEDINGS BY TRUSTEES OR AUDITORS

§ 336. In General

In some jurisdictions provision is made for trustees or auditors to administer an attachment debtor's estate.

Some of the attachment acts contemplate a proceeding somewhat analogous to proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy by the appointment of auditors or trustees to administer the debtor's estate and adjust the claims of all the creditors who come in under the attachment, and where this is the case the procedure thereunder is governed by the provisions of the act as interpreted by the courts.[44]

§ 337. Powers, Duties, and Liabilities

Form of action

(1) An order for attachment and appointing auditor has been held justified in New Jersey in an action based on fraud in the execution or performance of a contract—Williams & Davis v. Davis, 147 A 337, 105 N. J.Law 542.

(2) In Pennsylvania, in an action by a wife for desertion trustees may not be appointed, the attachment provided for in that case not being in the nature of a foreign or domestic attachment, but being regarded as doing, they exercise all the functions of a common-law auditor and are governed by the same rules that govern such officers[45] On their appointment all the estate of the debtor vests in them,[46] and they may sell so much thereof as is sufficient to pay defendant's debts,[47] restoring to the debtor the surplus left after such payment[48] They may sue on causes of action of the debtor in attachment[49] or to recover property fraudulently transferred by the debtor before the issuance of the writ,[50] and they may maintain an action against the sheriff for loss of the attached goods through negligence.[51]

b. Liabilities

Trustees acting in good faith are not responsible for errors of judgment or mistakes of law, but may be compelled to give an accounting, and in actions by creditors can avail themselves of defenses open to the debtor.

The powers of the trustees are not of a purely ministerial nature, and where they have acted in good faith they cannot be held responsible for an error of judgment or a mistake of law.[52] They can be compelled to account either by a creditor or by the debtor;[53] but no action by a creditor will lie against them until they have been called before the court which appointed them to settle their accounts[54] When trustees under an absconding debtor's act are sued by a creditor, they may avail themselves of the statute of limitations to the same extent that the debtor might in an action against him[55]

§ 338. Report and Action Thereon

The auditor's report is returned to the court for final judgment sustaining it or setting it aside.

The trustees or auditors must return their report to the court for final judgment within the time specified by the statute or a valid extension thereof.[56] The court may inquire into the merits of the matters involved and sustain the report,[57] or in a clear case set it aside and refer the matter back to the auditors,[58] or, if the evidence given before them be sent with the report, the court may supersede the finding of the auditors and itself render the proper judgment.[59] An applying creditor who has entered a rule for admission and presented his demand to the auditor cannot, however, attack the validity of the attachment on exception to the auditor's report.[60]

X. CLAIMS OF THIRD PERSONS

A. PRESENTATION AND DETERMINATION OF CLAIMS

1. In General

§ 339. Rights of Third Persons in General

Ordinarily a third person claiming ownership of, or an interest in, the attached property will be accorded the right to come into the attachment proceeding for the protection of such ownership or interest, but according to some authorities his right to do so must be expressly conferred by statute.

In the absence of a statute broad enough in its scope to permit such action, it has been held that a third person claiming a right to, or a lien upon, the property attached does not have a right to intervene in the attachment proceedings, and that a claimant of attached property, having no interest in the action or whose rights will be unaffected by its determination, is not entitled to become a party to it or to intervene therein for the purpose of asserting his title, but must resort to the common-law remedies or the statutory substitutes therefor.[61] The general tendency, under the statutes, however, is to afford claimant a more prompt redress for the invasion of his rights by allowing him to interplead, where his rights are directly involved and when necessary to preserve and protect such rights,[62] or to intervene in the action in which the attachment was sued out, or to resort to proceedings to try and determine the title to the property in dispute,[63] at least where the parties to the attachment suit fail to object to the intervention.[64] Indeed, it has been held, in the absence of a statute expressly conferring such right, that a person claiming some right in, or a lien on, the property attached may intervene in the proceeding, since such intervention prevents the abuse of process, circuity of action, and the delays and expenses arising therefrom.[65] In another jurisdiction, however, in the absence of statute, it has been held that intervention is allowed only when the rights of the intervener are directly involved, and only when necessary to preserve or protect such rights.[66]

Where a statute grants and limits the right to intervene in an attachment proceeding, the procedure is purely statutory, all parties interested being entitled to demand and have adherence thereto,[67] and the right will be restricted to the cases in which it is authorized by the statute.[68] Of course, where a claimant has voluntarily invoked the statute under which he elected to proceed, his rights must be asserted under the statute.[69]

The fact that the intervener has some other and adequate remedy for the protection of his property and rights is no bar to his right to intervene.[70] Conversely, the right of intervention is, unless otherwise provided by statute,[71] merely a cumulative, and not an exclusive, remedy, and does not preclude recourse by claimant to his other remedies.[72] On the other hand, where a claimant to attached property

"May" permissive

Although an owner of wrongfully attached property under Civ Code (1913) par 1648, may claim it under paragraphs 1649–1651, or as permitted by paragraphs 1410, 1411, in view of paragraph 1407, giving an officer levying attachment authority to require indemnity, claimant is not required to pursue such remedies, but may sue the officer for the value of the property, "may" being permissive in meaning—Montgomery v. Kirksey, 233 P. 588, 27 Ariz. 356.

Statutory trial of right to property is not the exclusive remedy of

has the right to intervene in the proceedings, it has been held that he is not entitled to an injunction to restrain a sale under the attachment.[73]

An intervener cannot question the regularity of the proceedings in the principal case,[74] nor is a person who purchases property after it has been attached entitled to defend the principal suit on its merits, where the attachment defendant offers no defense thereto.[75] Although generally the validity of the attachment is not in issue, as will be discussed in § 357 c (1), a third person not a party to the proceedings may, in some jurisdictions, successfully attack the proceedings if they are void on their face.[76]

Where the intervener, after obtaining possession of property, disposed of some of it, but not in the statutory manner, it was held that he could not return the balance and pay for the part that was sold.[77]

Allowance discretionary. In the absence of a statute expressly granting the right of intervention in attachment proceedings, it has been held that whether the particular facts require the application of such right is to some extent, at least, in the discretion of the court to which the petition is presented.[78] On the other hand, where an interested party has the right as a matter of law to intervene, the allowance of intervention is not discretionary.[79]

Compelling appearance by claimant. Attachment being a legal proceeding, a court issuing the writ has no authority to compel a nonresident to appear and litigate his rights to the fund attached.[80]

Effect of destruction of property. As an interpleader in attachment proceedings involves primarily the right of possession, it cannot be maintained after the property has been destroyed in the hands of plaintiff in attachment.[81]

Failure of defendant to controvert. Where the property of a person other than defendant is seized under the attachment, the failure of defendant to controvert the alleged grounds of the attachment will not deprive the third person of his right to intervene and set up his claim to the property.[82]

Purchase of plaintiff's claim by one of several interveners. Where plaintiff brings attachment and levies on personalty and other parties intervene adversely to each other, the purchase of the claim of plaintiff by one interpleader does not dispose of the claim of the other interpleader, and the case should proceed as to him.[83]

§ 340. Who May Intervene

The right to intervene, or to have a trial of the right of property, where it exists, extends to any person claiming a general or special interest in the property, and with some exceptions is limited to such persons.

Where any intervention is permissible, any person not originally a party to the action who claims an interest, either general or special, in the property attached, may intervene or resort to the statutory method for the trial of the right of property in order to have his rights adjudicated by the court in which the attachment suit is pending,[84] provided he was in actual possession of the property, or enti-

a person whose property is attached as that of another. He has the option to sue for the recovery of the property itself, or in damages for its value—Carmichael v. Page, (Tex Civ App) 32 S W.(2d) 674—Taylor Bros Jewelry Co v Kelley, (Tex Civ App) 189 S W 340

A claimant to real property which has been attached in an action between two other persons to recover upon an indebtedness, in which action the claimant of the property has no interest, has the right to intervene in defense of his property against the attachment—Bonfiglio v. Bonfiglio, 264 P. 747, 203 Cal. 409.

Conditional seller of truck

Where levy was made on a truck, which had been removed from the tled to such possession, at the time of the levy thereon under the attachment,[85] or the institution of the proceedings[86]

According to some authority the general statute granting the right of intervention, providing in terms in effect that any person may, before trial, intervene in an action or proceeding, who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest in both, extends the right of intervention to a person claiming the property attached or a lien thereon[87] Under this view an owner or claimant of property attached has such an interest against both parties to the proceeding as entitles him to intervene for the purpose of asserting his right and title to the attached property.[88] According to other authority, such a statute does not extend the right of intervention to an owner or claimant of the property attached. Under this view it is considered that ownership is not one of the essential questions to be determined in the litigation between plaintiff and defendant. Whether the property belongs to defendant or claimant, if determined, is considered as shedding no light upon the question in controversy, namely, that defendant is indebted to plaintiff[89] This rule, while followed, has been criticized as follows: "How it can be said that a person whose property has been attached, or who has a lien upon property which has been attached in an action against a third person, has no interest in the question as to whether the attachment shall be sustained and the property subjected to the payment of the judgment, we are unable to understand.

state where sold, before the expiration of ten days after the seller had notice that it had been removed, the truck was the property of the seller and it continued to be his as against the levy although he permitted the truck to remain out of the state over thirty days Since it was his property, he had a right to intervene in the attachment proceedings and set up his claim —Bradshaw v Kleiber Motor Truck Co, 211 P 305, 29 Ariz 293

Lis pendens notice

Where an attachment is sued out in the chancery court and property is seized which belongs to third persons and lis pendens notice is filed describing property not belonging to defendant but to such third persons, such persons may intervene to cancel the notices affecting such property or beclouding their title —Slattery v P L Renoudet Lumber Co, 87 So 888, 135 Miss 229

"The subject-matter which the plaintiff presented to the court, by his complaint, for adjudication, was the indebtedness of the defendants to him upon the promissory notes. In a legal point of view the intervenors had no interest whatever in the question of the existence of such indebtedness. That was a matter wholly between the plaintiff and the defendants, with which no stranger had a right to interfere When the judgment was entered against the defendants the whole original subject-matter of the suit was disposed of; and the case presents the anomaly of a contention still going on, to eventuate in another and independent judgment, leaving the first judgment in full force. This is not an intervention to protect an interest in the matter in litigation, but the introduction of a new subject of litigation It is true, the new subject-matter grows out of the attachment, but a writ of attachment is a part of the remedy, and has nothing to do with the cause of action If the property is seized by virtue of the writ, to which another has a better right, the vindication of such involved a new and independent judicial inquiry"—Lewis v Lewis, supra.

Event of suit

A title to a statute "to provide for the intervention of third parties claiming an interest in the event of any suit pending or to be brought" has been held not to include an owner of attached property so that he may intervene in the proceedings — Geis v. Geis, 250 N.W. 252, 125 Neb 394

Ownership not determinable

The fact that a third party claims to be the owner of attached property does not give him the right to intervene in the attachment suit, and to have the question of his ownership determined in the attachment suit — Haines & Co. v Stewart, 91 N.W. 539, 3 Neb.(Unoff) 216.

Such an intervener has a direct interest that his property, or property upon which he has a lien, shall not be subjected to the payment of another's debt to his detriment."[90] Also, under a general statute granting the right to intervene but providing that the "intervention shall be in subordination to, and in recognition of, the propriety of the main proceeding," it has been held that a person claiming an interest in the litigation may be permitted to intervene for the purpose of asserting rights; but where he has no interest in the litigation, but only in the property attached, he is not permitted to intervene. Under this rule a person cannot intervene for the sole purpose of moving for a dissolution of the attachment.[91] Under a statute providing that grantees may appear and defend in suits against their grantors in which the real estate conveyed is attached, where a creditor attached real estate, which defendant had conveyed to claimant, on the ground that the conveyance was fraudulent, claimant's petition for leave to intervene and defend against the allegation of fraud and the attachment was denied, since claimant sought to defend against matters not in issue.[92]

Under a statute providing that any person "other than the defendant" may intervene, it has been held that the words "the defendant" refer to defendants who are sought to be subjected to the money judgment prayed for, and not to those collaterally interested.[93]

Persons having no title to the property attached, and not in actual possession thereof or entitled thereto, cannot claim or recover the property, because their interests cannot be affected by the controversy.[94]

Defendant in attachment cannot set up the right or claim of a third person to the property attached, but this can be done only by the claimant himself.[95]

§ 341. —— Particular Persons

The right of particular persons to intervene under statutory provisions must be determined by the proper construction of such provisions.

Under the rule that third persons have no right to intervene in attachment proceedings unless a statute permits them to do so, as already discussed in § 339, it necessarily follows that the right of a particular person to intervene in the proceeding depends upon the statute under which the right is asserted. The usual statutory provision is that persons interested may intervene, and hereinafter in this section will be discussed whether particular persons may intervene under such or similar statutory provisions.

Assignee of defendant. It has been held that a foreign assignor of a nonresident defendant may intervene in order to protect the latter's rights,[96] but an assignee who has not taken possession of the property or had the assignment recorded has been held not entitled to maintain his claim against a subsequently attaching creditor.[97]

Claimants subsequent to attachment. The mode of proceeding by intervention is usually not proper when the claim is based on a sale, transfer, or mortgage made subsequent to the attachment levy,[98] although the statutes sometimes permit claimants whose claims are subsequent in point of time to intervene for the purpose of attacking the attachment.[99]

A purchaser of attached property from persons retaining possession following the execution of a release bond has been held to have such an interest in the property as to authorize intervention to prevent a subsequent sale to satisfy the judgment, since the property levied on attachment is completely released on execution of bond, so as to entirely destroy jurisdiction of the rem and consequent jurisdiction of the court to sell it.[1]

A statute providing that "grantees may appear and defend in suits against their grantors in which the real estate is attached" has been held to be applicable only to grantees whose conveyances were subsequent to the attachment; otherwise their duly recorded deeds would take precedence of the attachment, and they would have no occasion to defend.[2]

General creditors. Although in some states there are statutory provisions by virtue of which any creditors of the attachment defendant may come in under the attachment and share in the distribution of the proceeds of the property,[3] general creditors of defendant in attachment cannot, as a rule, intervene.[4]

Statutes allowing creditors who come in after another creditor has attached defendant's property to share pro rata with the attaching creditor have been held to be valid.[5] The purpose of such a statute is to provide a fair and equitable distribution of the available and attached assets of the debtor, and its theory is that the first attaching creditor holds the property for the benefit of all creditors who reduce their claims to judgment within a specified time, thereby relieving them of the responsibility, and the debtor from the costs, of the suing out of additional attachment process.[6] Where the statute permits other creditors to file under the attachment, the lien of creditors who so file relates back to the delivery of the original writ to the sheriff, and such creditors have all the rights of the original plaintiff.[7] Under such circumstances, the claim of a creditor filing under an attachment keeps alive the original attachment and levy, although there has been a dismissal by the first attaching creditor.[8]

According to some authority, under a statute providing that any person who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either party, or an interest in both, may intervene, a judgment creditor of an insolvent defendant,[9] or a mortgage creditor,[10] has such an interest as to entitle him to intervene.

Junior attaching creditors. In the absence of a statute to the contrary, one whose claim is based upon a subsequent attachment has no right to intervene in the proceedings,[11] but, according to some authority, a general statute providing that persons having an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either party, or an interest in both, may intervene, a subsequent attaching creditor has such a direct interest in defeating the attachment as to entitle him to intervene.[12]

Under some statutes a junior attaching creditor may intervene in a prior attachment suit and there contest his rights with plaintiff in that suit, although he cannot be let in to defend the suit and dispute the grounds of the attachment in lieu of defendant, nor to defeat the attachment for mere errors or irregularities in the proceedings.[13] A junior attaching creditor cannot, however, intervene as a claimant of the property in his own right.[14]

Lienholders. The right to intervene in attachment proceedings is not confined to persons claiming title to, or ownership of, the property levied on, but is also available to one who claims a lien upon such property and a right to subject it to such lien in priority to the attachment.[15] Accordingly, the right to intervene has been held to extend to one holding a com-

Under Comp St (1919) § 6781, all creditors who commence and prosecute their claims to final judgment within the prescribed sixty days are entitled to prorate with the attaching creditor without reference to whether such judgment had been procured in the district court or in the justice or probate court, or had been docketed in the district court within the sixty-day period, or at all—Greene v. Applying creditor

A statute directing that "any creditor" of defendant may be admitted under attachment as an "applying creditor," includes any creditor whether his claim is liquidated or unliquidated, who states that the debt is owing and states the amount, since an "applying creditor" is in the nature of an intervener acting on the principle that the goods of defendant are in legal custody and are for the benefit of all creditors—Skratt v Carnera, 175 A. 366, 12 N. Security

Where a lender advances money, taking stock as security, he may intervene to protect his security if the stock is attached in an action against the borrower—Banker's Mortg Co. v Sohland, 138 A. 361, 3 W W.Harr. (Del) 331.

mon-law lien for storage of the attached goods,[16] a mechanic's lien claimant,[17] a seller of goods who has exercised his right of stoppage in transitu,[18] and a landlord may intervene to assert against his insolvent debtor his right, as landlord, to unpaid rent.[19]

A mortgagee desirous of protecting his interest or of having the proceeds of the attached property applied first to the mortgage debt may intervene for that purpose,[20] provided, under some statutes, that the mortgagee has the right to present possession.[21]

Principal. Where there is evidence that property attached and sought to be subjected to payment of defendant's debt to plaintiff was held by defendant as agent of another, such alleged owner being a necessary party to a final and complete determination of ownership, should be permitted to intervene.[22]

Wife. Although under the statutes it is generally held that a wife claiming an interest in property attached in a suit against her husband may interplead,[23] it has been held that a wife, whose property was attached by her husband's creditors, on the ground that the conveyance from her husband was fraudulent, is not entitled to intervene, independently of statute, since her rights are not directly involved, and intervention is not necessary to protect them.[24]

§ 342. —— Estoppel to Assert Claim

While the claimant may be estopped by his conduct from asserting his claim, he will not ordinarily be estopped by the fact that he receipts for or gives a bond for the attached property, nor will he be precluded from setting up his claim in the attached property by the fact that he has pursued a remedy by way of replevin.

The owner of property levied on under an attachment against another may be estopped to assert his title in the attachment suit by reason of his own acts or declarations concerning the ownership,[25] but unless the elements of estoppel are present or the conduct of the owner amounts to fraud and deceit, he will not ordinarily be precluded from setting up his title.[26] Accordingly a claimant is not estopped to appear and assert his title in the attachment suit because of the fact that he has asserted the same claim in another suit,[27] or by reason of the service upon him of a summons requiring him to act as garnishee,[28] nor does any estoppel result from the fact that claimant fails to interplead after having obtained leave to do so,[29] or withdraws his claim from a sheriff's jury before a trial to test it is had.[30]

Trade name

An interplea in an attachment action was not invalidated by the fact that an individual interpleader claimed under a mortgage to a mercantile company, the company being the interpleader's trade name.—Boudreau v. Brown, (Mo App.) 89 S W. (2d) 455.

Trial of right to property

A mortgagee who has, under the mortgage, the right to take possession on default can prosecute an action for the trial of the right of property against one who attaches the mortgaged chattels.—State Exchange Bank v Shive & Keys Mill & Grain Co., (Tex Civ.App.) 170 S W. 1051

In Massachusetts, under Gen L. c 223 § 80, where mortgaged personal property is attached and on examination it appears that the mortgage is valid, the court, after finding the amount due on it, may direct the attaching creditor to pay it to the mortgagee, and if he does not pay or tender the amount within the time prescribed, the attachment is void No action is possible until the court has fixed the amount due and ordered payment. If the creditor allows the attachment to be dissolved, the dissolution is an act of law The remedies of the mortgagee if he has suffered loss must be obtained in other proceedings.—O'Neil v. Wife's separate property

Sheriff's misdescription

Where, in a suit on a promissory note, plaintiff secured an attachment on certain property, and by interplea a bank claimed to be the mortgagee of such property under a prior chattel mortgage, the sheriff's misdescription in the attachment writ was not binding on the bank so as to preclude its showing that the attached property and the mortgaged property were the same.—Bruce v Kays, 1 S. 29. Wangler v. Franklin, 70 Mo. 659

30. Vulcan Iron Works v Edwards, 36 P. 22, 39 P. 403, 27 Or. 563.

Where the intervener claims under a mortgage, he is not estopped from asserting his rights in attached property because he failed to file a renewal of the instrument[31] or, where he claims the property on the ground that he was fraudulently induced to sell it, by his failure to record it in the first place,[32] nor is an intervener mortgagee estopped from asserting his rights by permitting the mortgagor to sell the mortgaged property if the proceeds are properly accounted for.[33]

An owner of personalty in possession of a third person is not estopped from asserting ownership as against an attaching creditor by declarations of title by the person in possession which are unknown to the owner.[34]

Effect of receipting for property. The owner of property does not, by receipting for it upon its being attached as the property of another, preclude himself from afterward asserting his title to the property.[35]

Effect of giving bond According to some authorities, where property in the possession of a third person is attached as that of defendant in attachment, and the person in possession procures a return of the property to him by giving a forthcoming bond for the redelivery of the property or of its appraised value, he becomes estopped, as between himself and the levying officer and plaintiff in attachment, from afterward asserting paramount title to such property in himself,[36] and it has also been held that a third person signing as surety on defendant's forthcoming bond cannot subsequently intervene in the proceedings, claiming the property himself.[37] On the other hand, it has been held in a number of cases that no estoppel arises from giving a forthcoming bond,[38] and the view has also been advanced that the question of estoppel depends on whether or not, at the time of giving the bond, the claimant notifies the officer of his claim of ownership.[39]

A purchaser of property has been held not precluded from asserting his ownership by reason of signing the bond given by defendant in an attachment suit to release the property,[40] nor does the execution of a bond to dissolve an attachment estop a surety who claims the property from asserting his title thereto as against a subsequent attachment by the obligee.[41]

Effect of suing out writ of replevin. While it has been held that one who has already replevied the attached property may not intervene,[42] it has also been held that the suing out of a writ of replevin by a mortgagee against an officer attaching the property on mesne process against the mortgagor, and the removal of the property out of the commonwealth, do not affect the statutory right of the mortgagee to demand and receive from the attaching creditor the amount for which the property is liable to him on the mortgage.[43]

Purchase at sale. Where, in a controversy as to the ownership and right of possession of attached property, the court, during the pendency of an action to recover it from the attaching officer ordered the sale of the property because it was of a perishable nature, and where at such sale plaintiff became a bidder and purchased the property, the bid and purchase does not estop plaintiff from further asserting title and right of possession to the property.[44]

Claim of attaching plaintiff As a levy on property under an attachment is an assertion on the part of plaintiff in attachment that such property belongs to defendant, it follows that plaintiff is estopped to assert title in himself upon an interplea or intervention.[45]

§ 343. Nature and Subject-Matter of Claim

The nature of a claim to entitle a person to intervene depends primarily on the statute under which intervention is sought.

Whether the claim of a person seeking to intervene in an attachment proceeding is of such a nature as to entitle him to do so depends primarily on the statutes of the particular jurisdiction. Where the statute permits any person claiming title or interest in the attached property to intervene, the right to intervene is not confined to a claim of entire ownership of the property.[46] Such a statute includes any claim where the seizure and detention of property would entitle claimant to recover damages for the wrong and injury done to him by reason of such seizure and detention.[47]

Under some statutes it has been held that, in order to authorize the proceeding by intervention in the attachment suit, the claim of the intervener must be a legal and not merely an equitable one.[48]

If the statute confines the right to determine the title in the principal action by intervention or interpleader, or in a special statutory proceeding, to personal property, a claimant of realty or an interest therein cannot have his rights considered in those modes,[49] but if the statute does not so confine the right such a proceeding is available to a claimant of realty.[50]

§ 344. Time for Intervening

Intervention must be within the time, if any, fixed by statute. Where no time is so fixed it may be permitted during the progress of the proceedings, according to some authorities even until the final disposition of the property or its proceeds.

If the property of a third person is attached, he is not, on learning of the attachment, charged with any duty of promptly reclaiming it, but he may stand on his legal rights and choose his own time to assert them,[51] particularly where the adverse party has suffered no prejudice thereby.[52]

Since attachment serves only the purpose of bringing the attached property into court for the purpose of subsequent disposition,[53] while claim of intervention should properly be imposed before trial between the attaching plaintiff and defendant,[54] any interested person may present his claim before an order is entered adjudging the disposition of the property,[55] or, under a permissive statute, before a sale of the property.[56] In some instances intervention has been allowed after the attaching plaintiff has received judgment and the proceeds of the sale have been ordered paid to him,[57] and, under some statutes, before the disposition of the proceeds of the sale.[58] Under some statutes intervention may be had at any time before the end of the term at which 58. Murphy v Cochran, 80 Ky. 239.

Stranger to litigation

A stranger to the litigation may intervene to assert his rights to the judgment is rendered against defendant.[59] It has also been held that under some circumstances intervention may be had on appeal[60]

If the statute prescribes the time within which a third person must assert his claim in order to obtain and preserve his rights, a compliance within the statutory time is essential, and a failure to do so is fatal[61] A failure of a lienholder to furnish the attaching officer an account of the amount due, after demand therefor, within the time fixed by statute, has been held to be fatal to his lien[62] Under a statute providing that two days after issuing the writ the clerk shall post notice of it, and that any creditor of defendant, who, within sixty days thereafter shall commence and secure final judgment against defendant shall share pro rata with plaintiff, it has been held that creditors who commence their actions within the time prescribed, had the clerk performed his statutory duty, are entitled to share in the proceeds of the judgment, as the failure of an officer to do his duty will not deprive litigants of valuable rights[63]

Mortgagee. The filing of an interplea, by a person holding a mortgage on the property attached, after the mortgage debt has become due has been held to be proper.[64]

Release bond. Where an attachment has been discharged on a release bond, it has been held that a third party cannot intervene and recover judgment against the obligors in the bond given solely for the protection of another.[65]

§ 345. Notice of Claim or Demand of Property

a. Necessity of notice
b. Time for giving
c. Form and sufficiency
d. Service or filing
e. Effect of filing claim

a. Necessity of Notice

Where required by statute, claimant must give notice of his claim.

Where it is required by statute that a claimant of property seized under attachment against another must, in order to protect his rights, give notice of his claim to, or make a demand for, the property, claimant's failure to assert his claim after knowledge of the seizure will bar his right of action for the trespass[66] Under other statutes, however, such a notice or demand is required only where the property is levied on while in the possession of defendant named in the writ of attachment, under such circumstances as to raise a presumption that he is the owner thereof.[67]

Where an attachment is wrongfully levied under the direction of plaintiff in attachment, the notice of claim required by statute to be given to the levying officer for his protection need not be given to plaintiff in order to render him liable to the claimant for damages in trespass or trover.[68]

Under some statutes, where mortgaged personalty is attached it becomes incumbent on the mortgagee, if he intends to assert his lien as against the attachment, to make a demand or give notice of the existence of his lien,[69] and his failure in this respect will preclude a dissolution of the attachment and retention of the mortgage lien or an action against the attaching officer[70] Under some statutes the notice of his lien should be given by the mortgagee,[71] or his attorney,[72] and directed to the attaching creditor, or to each of several attaching creditors, and served upon him or them or the attaching officer.[73]

Nature of claim
Under a statute requiring the intervener to state the nature of the right by which he claims, failure to state that his claim was by virtue of a mortgage will prevent assertion of his claim as a mortgagee—Gulf Coast Lumber Co. v Miles, 90 So. 281, 206 Ala. 429.

Where there is no valid subsisting attachment, there is no necessity for a mortgagee to state what is due him on his mortgage and demand payment of the amount,[74] and, if a demand is required only on an actual seizure of the property, the mortgagee may maintain replevin after attachment by trustee process against the mortgagor, without a demand.[75]

Waiver. The notice required by statute to be given by the mortgagee to a creditor attaching mortgaged personal property cannot be waived by the levying officer without the consent of the attaching creditor,[76] although when the attaching officer, for whose protection statutory provisions as to notice and claim are made, does not object to the sufficiency of the notice, but demands and obtains an indemnifying bond, questions as to the sufficiency of the notice are waived.[77] It seems that the attorney of the attaching creditor may waive the notice, or extend the time within which it should be given or filed.[78] Where plaintiff in attachment joins issue on a claim to the property attached, which has been filed, he waives the right to have the claim dismissed as improperly filed,[79] and the execution of an indemnity bond to the levying officer after notice of a claim to attached property has been given, for the purpose of having him retain the property, and the acceptance by the officer of such bond, amount to a waiver of defects in the notice.[80]

b. Time for Giving

The notice or demand must be given within the time prescribed by statute.

The required notice or demand must be filed or served within the time prescribed by statute,[81] or, if no time is prescribed by the statute, within a reasonable time after the attachment.[82] What is a reasonable time depends largely on the circumstances of the particular case,[83] and, where the attaching plaintiff or officer is fully aware that the attached property is already encumbered, the intervening mortgagee will be allowed more latitude in making demand and statement of his claim.[84]

A notice has been held sufficient when given after judgment in the principal action,[85] after judgment against another claimant for a return of the property replevied,[86] before a sale of the attached property,[87] or after such a sale,[88] and before payment over of the proceeds.[89]

Where an unusual time intervenes between the attachment and the notice the reason for the delay should appear in the notice.[90]

c. Form and Sufficiency

The notice or demand, if no form is prescribed by statute, must give such information as to enable the officer or plaintiff to understand the nature of the claim and the property which it includes.

Where no precise form is prescribed, a notice or demand by a claimant of attached property is sufficient if it gives to the levying officer or the attaching creditor notice of the existence of the claim and such information as to its nature and, in a proper case, its amount as will enable the officer or the creditor to act understandingly with reference to it,[91] and mere informalities, inaccuracies, or defects which have no tendency to mislead or prejudice the parties

Affidavit of claim as condition precedent see infra § 352.

Notice held sufficient

(1) Under a statute requiring a claimant to property levied on who bases his claim on a mortgage or lien to state the nature of the right which he claims in his affidavit, it is sufficient if claimant simply states that he claims under a mortgage or under a lien, a further specification will not vitiate the notice or demand,[92] if the true interest is determinable by the pleadings and proof in the action.[93]

The property claimed, or upon which a mortgage lien is asserted, should be particularly described,[94] but a notice stating ownership of all the property levied on, except a portion owned by another person named, has been held not to be invalidated by the exception.[95]

A mortgage under which the claim and demand is made must be designated with sufficient particularity to enable the attaching creditor to possess definite and valuable information concerning the claim,[96] and a reference to the town records, without giving the date of, or the names of the parties to, the mortgage, is insufficient.[97] A statement that the mortgage was given to secure a note is insufficient.[98] The specification of a demand under one mortgage will not avail in a claim under other mortgages,[99] but will be limited to the mortgage in the demand or notice described.[1]

Ordinarily, where goods claimed are intermingled with goods of the attachment debtor, if claimant fails to assert his ownership and to designate the particular goods claimed by him, the whole is liable to seizure and sale.[2] It has been held, however, that a demand of mortgaged goods need not specify what part of the attached property is included in the mortgage,[3] and is not defective because describing all the attached property as included in the mortgage.[4]

Demand. The notice should conclude with a demand, or its equivalent, for the amount claimed.[5]

Statement of indebtedness. Where claimant asserts merely a claim against, or a lien upon, the property and not the absolute ownership thereof, under some statutes the notice must, with reasonable certainty, describe or designate the indebtedness secured,[6] and state the amount thereof,[7] and a failure to comply with the requirements of the statute with respect to such statement or account will have the effect of depriving the claimant of any claim or lien against the property so far as the rights of the attaching creditor are concerned.[8] A mere statement of what the mortgage was given for is not a statement of the amount due.[9]

A statement of a balance due upon a single demand will suffice; but in case of several distinct demands the amount due upon each separate demand should appear.[10] of the claim being unnecessary, since the rules of special pleading have no application to such proceeding—McDonald v. Stephens, 85 So. 746, 204 Ala. 359

(2) If the intervener contends that his claim is based on a mortgage from defendant in attachment, it is not a fatal defect if the attaching creditor neglects to mention that the mortgage was first executed to a third party, who transferred it to him—McDonald v Stephens, supra.

Notice held insufficient

Under a statute requiring a just and true account of the debt or demand, notice that claimant held a mortgage on property for three hundred dollars under which he had taken possession and incurred expense, with demand for payment, was insufficient—Fender v Blackmer, 138 N E 813, 244 Mass 447

Description of note without a statement of the amount due thereon will be insufficient—Sprague v. Branch, 3 Cush (Mass.) 575

Future advances

Where the mortgage is for future advances, the account need not contain a detailed statement of every item of a series of charges which are covered thereby, if the particular items are not requested—Hills v. Farrington, 6 Allen (Mass.) 80.

Notice held sufficient

Where a chattel mortgage was given for value and in good faith, a letter delivered to the attaching officer which contained a statement of the principal sum, date of mortgage, rate of interest, and recital that it was unpaid was sufficient notice of the amount due thereon, such statement being sufficient to enable a computation of the true amount due—Luciano v. Caldarone, 151 N E. 70, 255 Mass 270.

8. Magnifico v. Nicholson, 163 N.E 156, 264 Mass 519, 63 A L R 572—Fender v Blackmer, 138 N E 813, 244 Mass. 447—6 C J. p 384 note 36.

9. Sprague v. Branch, 3 Cush (Mass.) 575.

10. Housatonic Bank v. Martin, 1 Metc (Mass.) 294—Johnson v. Sumner, 1 Metc (Mass.) 172.

An innocent understatement of the amount due will not invalidate the demand[11] unless the amount actually due exceeds the value of the property;[12] neither will slight, innocent, and immaterial misstatements.[13] A statement of a greater sum than is due, if made in good faith, likewise will not defeat the claimant, if the value of the property attached is less than the sum actually due,[14] or the error was the result of accident or mistake,[15] unless the attaching creditor has been prejudiced thereby.[16] On the other hand, under such a statute, the test is not the value of the property, but the opportunity of the attaching creditor to reach a fair determination whether to pay off the encumbrance and hold the goods or to abandon his attachment and return them. He is not furnished such an opportunity where an account that is intentionally false and untrue is rendered. Accordingly, where a claimant knowingly furnishes an excessive demand, he thereby defeats his rights under the statute.[17]

Where a balance of the original indebtedness remains unpaid the account may state the sum actually due.[18]

Writing unnecessary. Unless required by statute, it is not essential that the notice of claim should be in writing.[19]

d. Service or Filing

Service of notice or claim must be in accordance with the statutory requirements.

Service on the attorney of the attaching creditor has been held sufficient under a statute requiring service on such creditor or the attaching officer.[20] Under a statute providing that any employee desiring to enforce his claim for wages at any time after seizure of the property under execution or writ of attachment, and before sale thereof is ordered, shall present to the officer levying on such property, or to the court having custody of such property, or from which such process issued, a statement under oath, etc., it has been held that, where a writ of attachment was issued against the crops of a tenant, a statement of claim by an employee for wages, filed with the clerk of the court from which the attachment issued, was a sufficient compliance with the law.[21]

e. Effect of Filing Claim

A person who files a claim to attached property becomes a party to the proceedings, but he obtains no lien thereby.

One who comes in under attachment proceedings and files a claim against the property and to share in its proceeds becomes a party to the proceedings,[22] but he does not thereby acquire any lien upon the property,[23] and he is estopped to assert a lien on the property prior to that of the first attaching creditor.[24]

§ 346. Account

Where the statute so requires, on proper demand claimant must file an account of his claim within a prescribed time or lose his right to the attached property.

Under a statute providing that a mortgagee, when the equity of redemption has been attached, shall render an account of the amount due him within a prescribed time, and that, if such account is not rendered within that time, his rights against the attached property are discharged, it has been held that the attaching creditor will be held to a strict compliance with all substantial requirements of the statute.[25] Accordingly, a demand for an account "forthwith,"[26] or one which fails to demand an ac-

Aggregate insufficient

Where several demands are secured a statement of the aggregate is not sufficient—Johnson v. Sumner, 1 Metc (Mass.) 172

25. Farr v Dudley, 21 N.H. 372, 380. "The rights which a mortgagee has to the land mortgaged are oftentimes his only reliable security for the payment of his debt, the personal security may be entirely worthless. Our statutes require much formality in the execution and recording of mortgages of real estate, and if the rights of an individual thus acquired are to be taken away by the simple act of an attaching creditor's giving notice for an account of the claim, and a failure to comply with the requirements of that notice, we think the attaching creditor should also be held to comply strictly with all substantial requisitions of the statute"—Farr v. Dudley, supra count for the amount due at the time of the demand,[27] has been held not to be in compliance with the statute, and not to require that an account be rendered within the prescribed time under the statutory penalty. A demand by a creditor must disclose his authority to make it by setting forth the fact of a levy under the attachment,[28] and a right to redeem from the mortgage;[29] but, where no more is required than a demand of an account of the mortgage debt, a demand by the officer in his own name and official capacity is sufficient without designating the creditor, the claim sued, the nature of the suit, or the court to which the writ is returnable.[30] Under such a statute the attorney of the attaching creditor has authority to waive the demand for an account, or to extend the time within which it may be filed.[31]

26. Green v. Kelley, 24 A. 133, 64 Vt. 309.

Where the attached property is discharged from the mortgage because no account is rendered, the officer need not again make a demand under a subsequent attachment.[32]

If, after proper demand, the account is not filed in accordance with the statute, the mortgagee loses his rights against the property,[33] and, if personalty has been attached, it is discharged from the mortgage.[34]

Under a statute providing that the officer levying the attachment may give claimant written notice of his attachment and, if claimant does not within ten days thereafter deliver to the officer a true account of the amount of his claim, he thereby waives the right to hold the property thereon, a claimant cannot excuse his failure to give notice of the true amount of his claim on the ground that the officer had already sold the property.[35] Also, under such a statute, the account must be delivered to the officer, a delivery to the creditor's attorney instead of the officer being insufficient.[36]

Where distinct demands are separately secured, separate accounts should be rendered stating the amount due on each and not the aggregate due on both.[37]

Sufficiency. Claimant in making his account under such statutes is not held as strictly to the requirements of the statute as is the creditor in making his demand. Accordingly, if the mortgaged premises are described correctly, it is immaterial that the description in the mortgage is not followed,[38] and the account is sufficient if it contains data from which such amount can be ascertained by computation.[39] Innocent inaccuracies or errors in the account rendered by a mortgagee of attached property to the attaching officer or creditor, resulting from accident or mistake, and which do not mislead or injuriously affect the attaching creditor, will not invalidate the demand of payment of his debt or defeat the mortgagee's right to enforce his lien,[40] although, if but part of the amount due is stated, a tender of that amount will discharge the mortgage.[41] If, however, claimant is required to file an account of his claim under oath, a mere unsworn letter stating the amount of the mortgage and claim, without showing the amount due, is insufficient.[42]

A reference to other persons for information concerning a part of the claim, the amount of which is not stated in the account, is insufficient as to that part.[43]

§ 347. Indemnity Bond

When a claimant to attached property asserts a valid claim thereto, under some statutes the attaching officer may require the plaintiff to give an indemnity bond.

In accordance with the general rules governing the giving of indemnity bonds to sheriffs and constables, as discussed in the title Sheriffs and Constables § 128 et seq., [57 C.J. p 918 note 87 et seq.], where the statute so requires, plaintiff must give an indemnity bond to the levying officer,[44] or claim-

Liability on bond

(1) Where plaintiff attached mortgaged property, and, on mortgagee's appearance and claim to the property, gave the sheriff an indemnifying bond, whereupon a receiver was appointed and took charge of the property, the levy of attachment was not a conversion of the mortgaged property which would subject plaintiff to liability to the mortgagee on the indemnity bond, and the mortgagee must look to the mortgaged property for satisfaction of his claim—Palo Sav. Bank v. Cameron, 168 N.W. 769, 184 Iowa 183.

(2) Other examples of liability on attachment indemnity bond.—6 C.J. p 386 note 73 [a].

ant,[45] for the purpose of imposing on the officer the duty and giving him the right to retain possession of the property, notwithstanding the adverse claim.

Under such statutes, a third party intervening to assert his claim may insist that the attaching plaintiff post a bond on presenting to the attaching officer a verified claim showing that such third party claimed the property attached, and setting out his right to possession,[46] if the intervener's claim is lawfully grounded and sufficient in form.[47]

While additional time may be allowed for the filing of the bond,[48] the failure of the attaching plaintiff to give a bond under such circumstances works a forfeiture of his attachment lien,[49] and authorizes the sheriff or attaching officer to release the attached property to the third party,[50] it being considered that his failure to give bond concedes the right of the intervener to the attached property.[51]

The fact that an indemnifying bond was executed to the sheriff before the levy of an attachment does not preclude claimants of the property from asserting their claims as provided by statute.[52]

§ 348. Operation and Effect of Determination

A finding of a sheriff's jury in favor of claimant is only prima facie evidence of ownership.

Where a sheriff's jury has been impaneled to try the validity of the claim, and found for claimant, as is customary in order that the sheriff may be protected by plaintiff's bond, the jury's determination is prima facie evidence of claimant's ownership, but is not decisive on the question of title.[53]

2. Actions or Proceedings to Establish Title or Recover Possession

§ 349. Form of Remedy

Under the practice in some jurisdictions a claimant may proceed by rule, by motion to discharge, or in summary proceedings.

In addition to the right of a third person claiming attached property to intervene in the attachment proceedings, as already considered in §§ 339–348, in some jurisdictions such a claimant may proceed by rule, if the rights of the parties will not be prejudiced thereby,[54] or he may have his rights determined on a motion to discharge the attachment,[55] or in summary proceedings provided for by statute.[56] Under some statutes, where an officer takes possession of property, under a writ of attachment, to possession of which the attachment debtor is not entitled, there results an illegal ouster of rightful possession which can be regained in a trial of the right to the property.[57]

Measure of damages in an action on an indemnity bond, indemnifying a chattel mortgagee and constable against loss from the levying of the writ of attachment on mortgaged property, is the value of the property converted.—Allerton v. King, 274 P. 90, 96 Cal.App. 230

46. Arena v. Bank of Italy, 228 P. 441, 194 Cal. 195

Right to possession

Where a claim of a third party to attached goods omitted expressly to assert any right of possession, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 689, it furnished no basis entitling the attaching officer to demand an indemnifying bond from plaintiff or justifying him in releasing the attached property when such bond was not given. Accordingly, a statement that the intervener is entitled to attached property because defendant in attachment gave him an assignment of such property does not set forth a right to possession entitling the attaching officer to insist on a bond.—Arena v. Bank of Italy, 228 P. 441, 194 Cal. 195.

47. McGaffey Canning Co. v. Bank of America, 294 P. 45, 109 Cal.App. 415

Amendment of claim

Where a claim of a third party to attached property, under Code Civ. Proc. § 689, was so defective as to furnish no basis for the sheriff's demand for an indemnifying bond, and so ineffectual as to give him no right to release the property for failure to give such bond, an attempted amendment could not give validity to the sheriff's void act in making the demand.—Arena v. Bank of Italy, 228 P. 441, 194 Cal. 195.

Invalid claim

A statutory provision authorizing the sheriff to release property claimed by a third person, unless an indemnifying bond is given, does not protect the third person asserting an invalid claim.—McGaffey Canning Co. v. Bank of America, 294 P. 45, 109 Cal.App. 415.

Summary process

(1) Summary process to determine ownership of attached property is allowable only in cases expressly authorized by law.—Adams v. Ross Amusement Co., 161 So. 601, 182 La. 252, affirming (App.) 158 So. 38.

(2) The attaching plaintiff's right to reconvene after intervention cannot be defeated because the intervener proceeded illegally in a summary manner, instead of regularly by petition and citation.—Adams v. Ross Amusement Co., supra.

57. Taylor v. Benningfield, (Tex.Civ.App.) 257 S.W. 933.

The character of the property at the time the attachment plaintiff is required to appear in court to contest claimant's rights may under the statute determine the procedure by which that right should be determined.[58]

Although, where a claimant to attached property has an adequate remedy at law, he, ordinarily, cannot resort to equity to obtain and preserve his rights,[59] it has also been held that a claimant may establish his prior lien on the property attached in an equitable proceeding, and, in the absence of a statute providing for intervention in the attachment proceedings by third persons claiming the property, it has been held that the question of ownership can be determined only in equity where all the facts can be ascertained and all the parties be brought in and their rights adequately protected.[60]

§ 350. —— Election

One claiming property seized under an attachment against another has an election as to the remedy by which he may assert his rights.

A person claiming property seized under an attachment against another has usually the option of instituting an independent action to protect or enforce his rights or of interpleading or intervening in the attachment suit for that purpose, as already discussed in § 339, and where resort to an independent action is had, claimant may usually maintain case, trespass, replevin, or trover.[61]

As the different remedies available to claimants are but different modes of determining the ownership of the property, it follows that if claimant elects to pursue one remedy he may be estopped to resort to another.[62] A mere failure on the part of claimant to avail himself of one statutory remedy does not, however, preclude him from resorting to another action,[63] nor does the fact that claimant is prosecuting another suit in the same court for the same cause prevent his appearing and asserting title to the property in the attachment suit.[64] It has also been held that the appearance and participation of a purchaser of property in an unsuccessful motion to discharge an attachment issued against his vendor on the ground that the conveyance was fraudulent does not preclude him from bringing subsequently an action to recover the property.[65]

Waiver of objection. An objection that a claim by a third person to property in the hands of the officer should be made, under the statute, by a petition in the attachment action, and not by a separate action in replevin, is waived where it is not raised before the trial of the replevin action.[66]

§ 351. Nature of Intervention Proceedings

An intervener's action to assert his interest in attached property is in effect in the nature of an action in replevin.

Although consequential and dependent on the levy of valid process on the property of claimant,[67] an intervention, or statutory trial to the right of property, is ordinarily a special proceeding created by statute, ancillary to a pending action and in aid of the remedy afforded by an attachment,[68] although it is, in many respects, an independent suit, performing, where the property is personalty, the same office in effect as replevin.[69]

"Interplea in attachment"

Where one who is not a party to an action files what he denominates an "interplea in attachment," which, without directly attacking the existence of any of the alleged grounds for attachment or any proceeding had therein prior to levy, merely de-

The interplea is an assertion by claimant of a title to the property attached superior to that of defendant in the attachment, and plaintiff in the attachment is thereby challenged to defend the title which he has asserted to be in defendant by attaching the property as his.[70] Accordingly, on the intervention, the intervener becomes plaintiff,[71] and plaintiff in attachment, defendant, and the action must be tried and determined separately from the attachment action,[72] on its own issues,[73] and the intervener must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title.[74]

The assertion by an intervener of a judgment lien on the attached property does not convert an intervention in an attachment proceeding into a suit to enforce judgment liens.[75]

§ 352. Conditions Precedent

Where the statute so requires, the filing of an affidavit of claim and bond is a condition precedent to proceedings by the claimant to establish and enforce his rights.

It is sometimes required that claimant of property attached under process against another shall present an affidavit or make oath to his claim; and, where this is the case, compliance with such requirement is a condition precedent to proceedings by claimant to establish and enforce his title or rights in the attachment suit,[76] and one cannot effectively assert his title or claim to the property or an interest therein by a simple unsworn statement.[77] This affidavit of ownership should name claimant[78] and set out the nature of the claim.[79] Such an affidavit, however, is not a pleading and mere technical niceties should not overshadow claimant's rights.[80] Accordingly, an affidavit in substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient, especially where it is so treated by the parties.[81] Likewise, it will not be deemed material that the oath was defective, where it is acted on, an indemnity bond is given by plaintiff, and no prejudice has resulted.[82]

In the absence of a statute to the contrary it is not essential to the validity of the claim affidavit that it should be accompanied by a jurat with the name of the officer who administered the oath signed thereto.[83]

Bond. Where the statute requires claimant of attached property to give a bond, compliance with this requirement is a condition precedent to his right to assert his claim in the attachment suit;[84] and, unless the bond is given, the court has no jurisdiction to try the issue, even though the parties to the nies that defendant in attachment or any other person than himself owns the personal property attached and claims for himself the title and in effect the right to the immediate possession of such property, he will be deemed an interpleader asserting a right in the nature of that of a petitioner in replevin, and as not moving for a discharge of the attachment.—Millus v. Not part of cause of action

Acknowledgment insufficient

Where a statute requires that a third party claim in attachment be verified by the party making it or his agent, an unverified demand by a person other than claimant as his agent is insufficient, even though an acknowledgment is made before a notary as to the truth of the facts stated therein.—Easterly v. Praul, 169 P. 396, 35 Cal.App. 39.

Adopting pleadings insufficient

The foreclosing of an attachment lien in favor of interveners is error, where interveners made no affidavit or bond to protect defendant, and their adoption of plaintiff's pleadings cannot be construed as an adoption of the attachment proceedings, so as to render them liable if the attachment had been sued out wrongfully.—Milliken v. action consent thereto.[85] However, a claimant who executes a bond, unauthorized by statute and insufficient, is not thereby estopped from securing a trial of the right of property by subsequently executing a statutory bond and complying with the other statutory requirements.[86]

§ 353. Defenses

Defenses available in replevin or ejectment are generally available in proceedings of this character.

Defenses which are good in an action for replevin, as discussed in the title Replevin §§ 77-83 [54 C.J. p 455 note 39-p 460 note 26], or in an action in ejectment, as discussed in the title Ejectment §§ 34-47 [19 C.J. p 1073 note 40-p 1089 note 60], are generally available against a person claiming property which has been attached in an action in which he is not a party. Accordingly, fraud on claimant's part,[87] or the fact that claimant does not have title to the property or the interest claimed,[88] or the invalidity of claimant's title, as that it was obtained under a conveyance made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors[89] is available as a defense. It is not a defense, however, where mortgaged chattels are attached in the possession of the mortgagee, to say that he is the equitable, and not the legal, owner;[90] nor can an interpleader's right to attached property, claimed under a bill of sale, be defeated because the purchase money was furnished by a company in whose name he transacted business, where he owned all the stock except a few shares which were held in trust for him.[91] A settlement as to other claims by the debtor and interpleader in attachment, which did not affect the claim of the interpleader to the property attached, is no defense to the intervention.[92]

In order for the defense of res judicata to be available in a proceeding of this character, the right to the property or the validity of the claim must have been judicially determined on its merits. Accordingly, where claimant had filed a motion to dissolve the attachment on the grounds that he was the owner of the property attached, which was denied, it has been held that a plea of res judicata was not available as a defense to a petition to intervene on the same grounds, the overruling of the motion only determining that it was not apparent of record that the attachment should not have been issued.[93] The fact that a wife was made a party defendant in an action against her husband in order to divest her of any right of dower that she might have in the lands sought to be subjected has been held not to bar her from intervening in a sale of personalty attached by a judgment sustaining the attachment and ordering a sale of personalty, where she was without notice that such personalty would be attached.[94]

§ 354. Jurisdiction and Venue

A third person claiming property attached as that of another should bring his proceedings in a court having proper jurisdiction.

In order properly to adjudicate the rights of an intervener, his claim should be brought in the court having the proper jurisdiction,[95] including jurisdiction of the amount involved, which has been considered as the amount at which the attached property is valued.[96]

Court held to have jurisdiction
Under Code Civ.Proc § 689, the superior court has jurisdiction to determine title of property released by sheriff on stipulation between the attachment creditor and third party claimant.—Citrus Packing Co. v. Municipal Court of City of Los Angeles, (Cal App.) 30 P.(2d) 534.

Under various statutes it has been held that the trial of the right or title to property levied on under attachment and claimed by a third person must be had in the same court in which the attachment proceedings were instituted,[97] in a court which acquires jurisdiction of the persons of attachment plaintiff and claimant,[98] or, where the writ is issued in a county other than that in which the property is seized, in the county where seizure was made.[99] The jurisdiction of a designated court to try title to attached property is not affected by a statute authorizing the trial in another court of rights of property in general.[1]

A court having common-law jurisdiction may try the issue where claimant alleges the legal title to land and the attaching creditor asserts the title to be equitable by way of mortgage,[2] and a court of equity has jurisdiction of a bill, by one receiving a stock of goods in extinguishment of a preexisting debt, against a sheriff and attaching creditors to subject the proceeds of the sale of the goods at an attachment sale to the satisfaction of said debt and to enjoin the sheriff from paying the proceeds to the attaching creditors.[3]

Dependent on existence and service of writ. In an action begun by attachment the court has jurisdiction by reason of the writ and service thereof Consequently, if there is no writ in existence, or it has not been levied on or served, the court has no jurisdiction of the issue raised between the parties or by an interpleader.[4]

§ 355. Time to Sue and Limitations

The accrual of a cause of action and the commencement of actions is discussed in the title Actions §§ 124, 126–130. Limitations of actions is treated under the title of that name. The time for intervening is discussed in § 344 supra.

§ 356. Parties and Process

a In general
b Process

a. In General

Only persons directly or immediately interested are necessary or proper parties.

Generally, only persons directly and immediately interested in the subject matter of the suit need be made parties,[5] and one having no interest in, or claim to, the property is not a necessary party to a controversy respecting its ownership.[6] Accordingly, where a person other than attachment defendant asserts ownership of, or a lien on, the property attached,[7] or where subsequent attaching creditors intervene to have a previous attachment set aside as fraudulent, after the property has been sold and the fund is in court,[8] original defendant is not a necessary party to the proceedings. Also, attorneys for attaching creditors need not be made parties defendant to an intervening petition by claimant of the attached property.[9]

One claiming an undivided interest in the property attached is entitled to try the right of property without joining his coowner as a party.[10]

Where claimant dies pending proceedings to try right to the attached property, his heirs or legal representatives should be made parties.[11]

It has been held that where one claiming a preferred lien for services on attached property, which claim is disputed, sues, as required by statute, to establish his claim, neither the sheriff holding the attached property nor the attaching creditor is a nec-

Defendant as party

Where notes are attached as defendant's property on the ground that a sale of them to a third person was actually to defendant, and an intervener asserts ownership because the sale was void, it is unnecessary for defendant to be before the court in any other capacity than defendant to the original bill—Bradshaw v Georgia L. & T. Co, (Tenn Ch A) 59 S W. 785.

essary or proper party.[12] The failure of claimant to obtain leave to become a party has been held to be waived where the attaching creditor without objection tries his right to the property.[13]

Proper parties Attaching creditors may be made parties to an action of replevin by claimant against the attaching officer for the purpose of defeating the claim,[14] but in a case where several attachments were levied by different persons on different articles of personalty which had been jointly purchased at one time by several purchasers from defendant in attachment, before the levy of the attachment, it was held that such purchasers could not require the attachment creditors, in a suit for the purpose, to contest with them whether the property is subject to attachment, without alleging that the attack on the validity of plaintiff's title involved a common question.[15]

Substitution of proper party by amendment. If an interplea is improperly interposed by the beneficiary of a trust, the trustee may be substituted in his stead by amendment.[16]

b. Process

A voluntary submission to the court's jurisdiction may operate as a waiver of proper process.

If the parties in the intervener's action voluntarily submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the court without process, the judgment of the court is as valid as if process had been issued.[17]

A statute, providing that any other creditor of defendant making and filing an affidavit and undertaking, as required of attachment plaintiff, together with his claim or demand, shall be made a party plaintiff and have like remedies against defendant to secure his claim or demand as the law gives to plaintiff, has been held not to be intended to permit such creditors to prosecute their claims to judgment under publication of notice and levy of a writ by the original attaching creditor, as the word "remedy" as so used is the means employed to enforce a right or redress an injury.[18]

a. Claimant's Petition or Application

(1) In general
(2) Amendments

(1) In General

Where the statute so requires, claimant should apply for relief by a proper petition or complaint, setting forth the nature of his claim and the facts upon which he relies.

Under some statutes, where a claimant to attached property files an affidavit of claim, the necessity for which has already been discussed in § 352, no pleadings are required.[19] Where, however, the statute so requires, third persons claiming property, or an interest therein, which has been attached as another's must come into the proceeding by petition.[20] The complaint, petition, or interplea should be in writing;[21] and, where the statute so requires, must be verified[22] by the party himself, his agent, or attorney.[23] It must, of course, set out matter sufficient to present an issue,[24] and to support a verdict and judgment;[25] but it has been held not

Complaint or petition held sufficient

(1) A complaint alleging plaintiff's possession of timber, a writ of attachment in defendant's action against a third party and a wrongful withholding of possession, and a taking of possession from plaintiff's known agent to plaintiff's damage, and demanding its return, stated a good cause of action for replevin—Northern Timber Products Co v. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co, 173 N W. 439, 143 Minn. 200.

(2) A petition alleging the relation of suretyship between an intervener and defendant, in a judgment against both, his payment of the judgment under compulsion, and return of an execution showing no property of the principal found, and asserting right to the benefit of the lien of the judgment by subrogation, is sufficient on its face—Yellow Pine Lumber Co. v. Mays, 94 S E 42, 81 W Va 46

25. Neal v. Newland, 4 Ark. 459.

necessary to aver anything not indicated by the statute.[26]

In deciding as to the propriety of sustaining a demurrer to an interplea, only the averments of the interplea will be considered.[27]

Affidavit of merit unnecessary. A statute requiring in certain cases an affidavit of merits with a plea filed by the defendant named in the declaration stating that he has a defense upon the merits to the whole or a part of plaintiff's claim has been held to have no application to the petition of an intervener claiming property which has been attached as that of another, since he is not a person against whom plaintiff claims a recovery.[28]

Denial of claim. It has been held requisite for the claimant of the attached property to deny in his complaint, interplea, or petition, the claim of attachment plaintiff[29] On the other hand, a denial, by claimant, of the existence of the relation of debtor and creditor between himself and plaintiff has been held to be sufficient.[30]

Designation of property. The claimant should describe or designate the property attached and claimed by him,[31] and aver its value.[32]

Nature of claim. The intervener should set forth the nature of his claim to the property attached,[33] and show by his pleading whether such claim is absolute or conditional[34] While, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, it is not necessary to state from whom the property was acquired or the consideration paid therefor,[35] the petition should set forth the facts upon which the claim of ownership is based.[36] A simple allegation of ownership may be sufficient,[37] although it has been held that attachment plaintiff is entitled to demand the amendment of such a pleading of intervention, so as to give such information as will acquaint him precisely with the nature of the demand he has to meet.[38]

Under a statute requiring claimant to set forth the nature of his claim, where the intervention is based on a mortgage, it is not sufficient for claimant to state that he owns the paramount title, right, or interest in the attached property without making reference to the mortgage[39] It has also been held that one who claims as mortgagee must allege maturity of the debt and subsequent breach, or some other breach of condition such as entitles him to possession of the property.[40]

Showing right to relief. It has been held that, where title is not directly involved, such facts must be alleged as would authorize a court of equity to grant claimant a writ of injunction,[41] and under a statute extending equitable relief to a claimant whose property has been so withheld that it cannot be replevined, it must appear from the allegations of the bill that the goods sought to be delivered up were so controlled that an attempt to replevin them would be useless[42]

42. Luciano v. Caldarone, 151 N.E. 70, 255 Mass. 270.

(2) Amendments

Claimant's petition or application for relief may be amended upon timely application.

An intervener has the right to amend his pleadings to correct faults therein.[43] Accordingly it has been held that a claimant who files an affidavit and bond to try the right of property may thereafter amend his pleading and ask damages for the seizure.[44]

Where an order of amendment of a petition in intervention has been twice made by the trial judge, and each time the amendment offered has failed to meet the requirements of the order, the intervention may be properly dismissed.[45]

Of course, application for amendment must be timely made. Accordingly, it has been held that a claimant's motion to amend his petition must be made not later than at the close of his evidence,[46] and that an amendment cannot be made after final judgment in the attachment proceedings which settled all the rights of the parties thereto, including the claim of the intervener, and after the attached property has been sold.[47]

b. Plea or Answer

Where the statute so requires, the creditor should file a sufficient plea or answer to the interplea.

Where, under the statute, trial of the right to the attached property takes place upon the intervener's petition, an answer to the petition by the attaching creditor is neither necessary nor proper,[48] and it has been held that where one comes into suit in attachment for the sole purpose of asserting his claim to the property, a reply to his answer is not necessary.[49] Where, however, the statute so requires, a plea or answer to the interplea is necessary, which, where the statute requires all pleadings to be in writing, must be in writing.[50] This plea or answer should sufficiently tender an issue,[51] but, where the interplea admits the indebtedness of defendant in attachment, it is not necessary that the attaching plaintiff should allege such indebtedness in his answer.[52] Where an answer sets up a claim to the attached property, which with the accompanying exhibits clearly shows that at the time the attachment was levied defendant had no claim to such property, an exception to so much of the answer as attempts to set up such defense is properly sustained.[53]

A replication to an interplea in attachment which alleges a levy on property standing in the name of the attachment defendant, without notice of interpleader's alleged ownership of the property, is good against general demurrer, without the further setting up particular facts showing the legality of the levy.[54]

Counterclaim. Under some statutes a counterclaim may be filed in an interplea by a third person claiming the property, provided the counterclaim arises on the transaction set forth in the complaint or is connected with the subject of the action.[55]

Amendment. An answer to a petition in intervention has been held not to be amendable as to matters which plaintiff in attachment knew and could have included in his original answer and which he failed to include.[56] Under a stipulation filed in attachment suit by creditors against an assignor, in which the assignee intervenes "that the said attaching cred-

In an action for possession of property held by a sheriff, to justify his seizure of the property the sheriff must plead and prove facts necessary to support the writ, and that the property belonged to defendant in the writ—Fulp v. Brashears, 241 P. 69, 116 Or. 538.

Fraudulent character of claimant's title

The answer may, by way of general denial or otherwise, show that the title of claimant is fraudulent as to creditors of attachment defendant.—Saling v. First Nat. Bank, 182 P. 140, 93 Or. 237—6 C.J. p. 391 note 56 [a].

Plea of fraud proper

Where an attaching creditor sues defendant and attaches his property, and intervener claims such property under a sale from defendant, the attaching creditor may plead that the sale was bogus, and for the purpose of concealing the fact that defendant was doing business in the state—Pring v. Pratt, (Tex.Civ.App.) 1 S.W.(2d) 441.

(1) Issue
(2) Proof
(3) Variance

(1) Issue

(a) In general
(b) Time for joining issue

(a) In General

The issue is confined to the claimant's right to the property.

The issues triable in a proceeding on an interplea are those raised by the pleadings,[58] which, since one claiming title to, or ownership of, attached property is generally concerned only with the establishment of that right, is ordinarily whether the property levied on is that of attachment defendant, or that of claimant, or whether the latter is entitled to its possession or has a lien thereon.[59] The intervener cannot litigate with defendant in attachment anything foreign to the attachment suit, and his action must be confined to proving his rights to the property attached.[60] The issue under the interpleader is not connected with the issues in the attachment suit,[61] and, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, an intervener cannot question mere irregularities in the attachment proceedings,[62] although there are decisions which recognize the right of claimant, under such circumstances, to contest the validity of

Issue

(1) The issue is whether the attached property is subject to the writ.—Loveman, Joseph & Loeb v Foster, 150 So 170, 227 Ala 385.

(2) Title involved is the paramount issue between an intervener and the attaching plaintiff.—Saenger v Standard Lumber Co, 50 S W (2d) 589, 185 Ark 990—Bank of Manchester v. Universal Credit Co., 164 S E 95, 45 Ga.App 233.

(3) The issue is whether or not the property attached belongs to the intervener.—Roseman Feed Co. v. Nashville Grain & Feed Co, 109 S E 881, 182 N C 690.

Petition to from issue granted

Where plaintiff issued an attachment against A and the sheriff attached property as that of A, and where claimant's petition alleging his ownership of the property and praying for a dissolution of the attachment on his giving security was granted, it was held that although the practice was irregular, claimant's further petition for an issue to determine the ownership of the goods should be granted.—Burleigh v. White, 8 Pa Dist. & Co. 113.

In Texas

(1) Since it is held that a writ of attachment cannot be abated on the ground that defendant is not the owner of the property attached, a person, with whom the debtor and creditor relationship does not exist with plaintiff, is not required to plead and prove that the attached property does not belong to defendant but belonged to him, since to inject such an issue in the case would be to require the court to take cognizance of an issue when presented by an answer, when it could not acquire jurisdiction by a plea in abatement.—Farmers' Nat. Bank of Stephenville v. Daggett, (Com App) 2 S W.(2d) 834, affirming Daggett v. Farmers' Nat. Bank, (Civ App.) 259 S.W. 198.

(2) On the other hand, in a trial of right to personal property, since it is merely a possessory action, the issue to be tried is whether the attaching creditor or claimant is entitled to possession at the time of the levy of attachment.—Sanders v. Farrier, (Civ App.) 271 S W 293.

(3) The requisites of issue in trial of right of property are the authority and right by which plaintiff seeks to subject property levied on to his execution and nature of claim of defendant thereto.—Sanders v. Farrier, supra.

(4) The lien of an attaching creditor is fixed at the time of levy of attachment, and he is entitled, or not entitled, to immediate possession through the officer at that time, and if claimant is entitled to possession at such time, then he and not the creditor is entitled to judgment in his favor at date of trial of issues.—Sanders v Farrier, supra.

Waiver

The right of a plaintiff to object to a litigation by an interpleader on a controversy unconnected with the attached property and wholly foreign to the litigation presented by plaintiff is not waived by answering that part of an interplea which sets up interpleader's claim to the attached property, nor by appearing and cross-examining at the taking of depositions on behalf of interpleader, where the cross-examination concerns only the right to the possession of the property.—Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank of Wakefield v. the proceedings on the ground of jurisdictional defects,[63] or where the process is void on its face.[64] Accordingly it is held that the claimant cannot urge a defense personal to attachment defendant,[65] such as the insufficiency of the affidavit on which the attachment issued,[66] or the insufficiency of the bond,[67] or dispute the existence, validity, or amount of plaintiff's claim,[68] the grounds of attachment, where judgment against defendant has been rendered,[69] the making of a levy on the property,[70] or the validity of the levy.[71]

Claim of priority as creditor. An intervener claiming the property under an assignment from defendant in attachment is in no position to claim priority as a creditor.[72]

Estoppel of creditor. Where the attaching creditor admitted in its answer to a petition in intervention that the debtor and his wife were the owners and in possession of the goods at the time they executed a bill of sale thereof to the intervener, it could not contend at the trial that a prior bill of sale executed by the debtor alone defeated the bill of sale to the intervener.[73]

Immaterial issues raised by the pleading will not be tried.[74] Issues not raised by the pleadings are also immaterial.[75]

The question of value or damages for detention cannot, as a general rule, be considered in the intervention proceedings,[76] unless the issue is not restricted to the establishment of claimant's title or right of possession.[77]

(b) Time for Joining Issue

The issues must be joined within the statutory time.

Where a statute prescribes the time within which issue must be joined, there must be a compliance therewith. Under some statutes the issue is to be made up by the attachment creditor at the term of court to which the attachment is returnable, failing in which the levy is to be discharged and the claimant released from his bond;[78] but the claimant or intervener is not required to join issue until final

74. Fraudulent nature of conveyance

Where a husband, under a power of attorney from his wife, conveyed to himself real property which she had before the power conveyed by trust deeds to secure a certain creditor and, by a subsequent conveyance, conveyed it directly to the creditor in satisfaction of his wife's obligation, it was held that, in a subsequent action against the wife aided by attachment of this property, an allegation in the reply to the creditor claiming under his deed, and intervening against plaintiff that the conveyance from the husband to himself was without consideration and made to hinder creditors, raised an immaterial issue, owing to the husband's subsequent deed making the invalidity of the deed to himself of no consequence —Tennis v Barnes, 52 P 1038, 11 Colo App 196

75. Sex

In claim proceedings it is immaterial whether defendant in attachment was a man or a woman where no question of coverture is involved — Weinstein v Yielding, 52 So. 591, 167 Ala 347.

Not a default

Failure of plaintiff in an attachment proceeding to move at the return term to make up issue to try right of claimant to funds in the hands of the garnishee does not con judgment in the attachment case.[79] Also, under some statutes, it has been held that failure to join issue in a claim case, within five minutes after an announcement of "ready" by both parties, is sufficient reason for dismissing the levy.[80]

Under a statute providing in trial of the right of property cases that if plaintiff appears and defendant fails to appear, or neglects or refuses to join issue "under the direction of the court" within the time prescribed for pleading, plaintiff shall have judgment by default, where a claimant stated on appearance day that he was ready to join issues when the court should reach the case on the docket and direct issues to be made, and no objection was made to this, it has been held not to be an abuse of discretion to refuse to give plaintiff a default judgment four weeks later, or to permit issues to be thereafter joined.[81]

(2) Proof

An intervener must prove his right to the attached property, and proof need not and cannot be made of matters not within the issues.

An intervener must prove his essential allegations in his petition for intervention, and, to have any standing in court, he must first establish his title, lien on, or interest in the property attached,[82] and he must recover on the strength of his own title or claim and not on the weakness of his adversary's.[83] To do so it is incumbent upon him to show that he acquired his title or right prior to the interposition of his claim.[84] If the intervener claims as administrator, he must offer proof tending to show his authority as such,[85] while if he claims as a trustee for the benefit of creditors, he must show that there are other creditors than attachment plaintiff.[86]

Proof need not be made of matters not in issue. Accordingly, where on a trial of a claimant's right to attached property the creditor's good faith is not questioned, proof need not be made that he is a creditor in good faith.[87] Where, under the statute, an interpleader by filing his interplea concedes that an attachment suit is pending and that a writ of attachment has been obtained and levied on the property, on a hearing on the interplea it is not necessary that plaintiff offer in evidence the record in the attachment suit to show his lien upon the property attached.[88]

Likewise, proof cannot be made of matters not in issue. Thus, in an action of attachment where an interpleader claims the property, a compromise between defendant and interpleader cannot be considered in favor of plaintiff unless specially pleaded.[89] Likewise, a defense that claimants' title was obtained for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff cannot be interposed and proved where it is not alleged.[90] Since an interpleader must recover on the strength of his own title, he cannot show that the attached property belonged to some person other than attachment defendant or himself.[91] Where one holding a bill of sale to certain goods accepted from the sheriff an appointment as custodian thereof after their attachment by a creditor of the former owner, the attaching creditor cannot contend that he was thereby estopped to intervene and claim the goods, if no estoppel was pleaded in the answer to the petition in intervention.[92]

(3) Variance

An immaterial variance between the pleadings and proof is not fatal.

Immaterial variances between the allegations and proof are not fatal. Thus a third party claim to attached property cannot be defeated merely because it states the value of the property is greater than statute default, under Code (1906) §§ 4992, 4993 (Hemingway Code §§ 3266, 3267) as such sections apply only to the claim of a third person to property levied on by execution.—Piqua Sav Bank v Copiah Hardware Co., 111 So 836, 146 Miss 581.

In Alabama, according to an early case on the trial of the right to property between attaching creditors and claimant, the creditors must prove that the property in controversy belonged to defendant in attachment at the time of the levy, and, for this purpose, they may trace the title from the original owner to defendant, and may show the character of the actual possession to disprove the authority of one actually in possession to convey or assign the property to claimant, and, in such a case, any evidence as to the authority of the person in actual possession to convey the property, or as to the consideration of the conveyance, and its amount, is admissible.—Elliott v. the proof shows it to be[93] On the other hand, it has been held that one who claims attached property as owner cannot support his claim by evidence of either a mortgage or a lien.[94]

§ 358. Evidence

Reference should be made to the title Evidence for the general rules of evidence which are applicable to proceedings of this nature Questions involving presumptions and burden of proof, admissibility, and the weight and sufficiency of evidence arising in this type of proceeding will be treated in the sections immediately following.

§ 359. —— Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a. Presumptions
b Burden of proof

a. Presumptions

The usual presumptions arising in civil actions prevail, including those growing out of claimant's possession of the attached property.

The usual presumptions arising in civil actions apply in a proceeding by a third person claiming property attached as that of another. Accordingly, if the writ of attachment is regular on its face, it will be presumed to have been properly issued.[95] Where a claim of intervention is filed in a corporation's name by its treasurer, and its president and treasurer, being two of three directors, appear to prosecute the claim, a presumption exists that the filing of the claim was the authorized act of the corporation.[96] The fact that the intervening claimant was in possession of the property attached at the time of the levy thereon raises a presumption that he was the owner at such time;[97] and where the record title to property is in the wife, and there is evidence that her money bought this property, a presumption is created that it is her separate property, allowing her to intervene when such property is attached by a creditor of her husband[98] Also, where an intervener holds a draft with a bill of lading attached, made payable to his order, a presumption arises that he is a holder in due course.[99]

b. Burden of Proof

Generally, where the attached property was in defendant's possession, claimant has the burden of proving his right to the property; but, where claimant had possession, the burden is on plaintiff to disprove claimant's right to the property.

Although there is authority to the contrary,[1] where a party interpleads, or institutes an independent action, claiming a right in the property superior to that of the attaching creditor, the burden is, as a rule upon him to establish the validity of his claim,[2] at

Bank

(1) In an action against a consignor of goods under a bill of lading with draft attached, in which a writ of attachment was levied on the proceeds of the goods, a bank claiming to be the bona fide purchaser of the draft for value and in due course had the burden of proving its title —Sterling Mills v. Saginaw Milling Co., 114 S E 756, 184 N C 461.

(2) The burden was on the intervener bank, claiming the proceeds of a draft attached by plaintiff, to show its title —Moon-Taylor Co. v. Gray-Smith Milling Co., 97 S E 213, 176 N C. 407

(3) Where the buyer, in an action against the seller, attached funds paid on a draft and the seller's bank filed an interplea, claiming ownership thereof, the court rightly instructed that it devolved on the interpleader to prove that the funds, at the time they were attached, belonged to it —Townsend Wholesale Grocery Co. v. Chamberlain Canning Co., (Mo App) 277 S.W. 958

Holder of chattel mortgages

The burden was on the intervener to prove that the property attached was covered by its chattel mortgages —Grover v. Cash, 253 P. 676, 69 Utah 194.

least where the property attached was in the possession of defendant in attachment,[3] or under some statutes, in the possession of a person other than claimant.[4]

Where, however, claimant was in possession of the property at the time of the levy thereon, this fact may throw upon the attaching plaintiff the burden of proving that the property was subject to attachment under his writ.[5] Under such circumstances, claimant has the burden of showing that he was in possession.[6]

The statutes sometimes impose upon the attaching creditor, in all claim cases, the duty of first establishing a prima facie case of ownership in the attachment defendant and liability of the property to attachment, whereupon the burden is shifted to the claimant who must then proceed to show his title to or lien upon the property.[7]

Where claimant has shown that he acquired title to the property attached as that of the debtor the burden is cast upon the attaching creditor to show facts and circumstances from which a transfer by claimant can be inferred.[8]

According to some authority, in a controversy between an attaching creditor and the claimant of the property, the creditor has the burden to show that attachment defendant owed the debt or some part thereof.[9]

Attack on attachment proceedings. It has been considered that where the interplea is a denial of attaching plaintiff's right to hold the property by reason of some vice or defect in the attachment proceedings, the burden is upon attaching plaintiff to show the levy of a valid writ and prima facie ownership in attachment defendant before it is necessary for the intervener to introduce any evidence.[10]

Fraud or collusion. If a transfer of the property to the intervener is admitted, but fraud is alleged and relied on to avoid such conveyance, the burden of proof rests upon the party who sets up fraud.[11]

Corporation

In an action against the president and controlling stockholder of a corporation as an individual, the burden was on the intervening corporation to prove that it owned movable property attached as that of the individual—Modisette & Adams v Lorenze, 112 So 397, 163 La. 505.

Members of syndicate

Where defendant as a member of a syndicate sold stock to plaintiff in violation of law, and plaintiff sued and attached money in defendant's name in a bank, and members of the syndicate intervened, claiming a right to the money, such interveners had the burden of proof to show their title and right to possession of the money—Landwehr v. Lingenfelder, (Mo App) 249 S W. 729.

Money

An interpleader claiming title to money attached by plaintiff in the case had the burden of proving title or right to the money—Rathbone v Rathbun, (Mo App) 35 S W (2d) 38

Purchaser before attachment

The burden of proof is generally on the purchaser who bought of defendant before levy, and who intervenes to claim the property—Wells v Guaranty State Bank, 156 P. 896, 56 Okl. 688

Son as intervener

In an action by a son to cancel a writ of attachment issued against his father, on the ground that the son was the owner of the real estate in question, the burden of proof was on the son—Newman v Northern Montana Ass'n of Credit Men, 208 P 914, 63 Mont 545

Transferee of bill of lading

Buyer of truck

Where the buyer of a truck from plaintiff sells it to defendant and defendant resells it to the buyer but keeps possession, the buyer may intervene in an attachment action between plaintiff and defendant, although the fact that defendant had the truck when it was attached puts the burden on the buyer of showing that he had title or right to possession—Henley v. Bradshaw Mercantile Co., 124 So. 426, 220 Ala 193

Shifts burden

Plaintiff's proof of defendant's possession and control claiming to own, and exercising customary acts of ownership over, property when attached, sufficed to shift to the parties, interposing claim, the burden of establishing their right—Dusenberry v Black, 99 So. 910, 211 Ala 153

Bad faith

Under statute exempting from attachment materials furnished for use in construction of a building, as long as such materials were to be applied in good faith to construction or repair of the building, the burden was on an attachment creditor to show bad faith in the purpose for which the materials were on the ground.—

Where interveners charge collusion between plaintiff and defendants in attachment for the purpose of allowing plaintiff to obtain unlawful preference over the interveners and other creditors of defendants, the burden is on the interveners to prove such charge.[12]

Making up of issue by court. Under a statute providing that where a third person interposes a claim to the attached property an issue shall be made up under the direction of the court, the court has in its discretion authority to make plaintiffs take the position of actors, thus placing upon them the burden of proof[13]

§ 360. —— Admissibility

Competent evidence which is relevant to the issues is admissible.

Subject to the general rules of evidence, the claimant or intervener is entitled to introduce any proper evidence relevant to the issues and tending to establish his title to or claim upon the property,[14] while the attaching plaintiff may show any facts legitimately tending to dispose of or avoid such title or claim,[15] under the denial contained in the general replication.[16] Plaintiff in attachment cannot, however, show that other persons have an interest in conjunction with the interpleader, or that the interest of the interpleader is subject to the claims of a stranger,[17] and, in general, any evidence which does not legitimately tend to throw light on the issues in the intervention should be excluded.[18]

Claimant under chattel mortgage

Where the vendor of land claimed a lien on cotton raised thereon and sought an attachment, claimant of the cotton under a chattel mortgage from the vendee of the land could introduce evidence tending to show nonexistence of the relation of landlord and tenant between the vendor and the mortgagor—Herzfeld v. Hayne, 76 So 973, 200 Ala. 615.

Contract to which plaintiff is not a party

Evidence of a contract between defendant in attachment and claimant, to which plaintiff was not a party, is not binding on plaintiff and is inadmissible in a claim suit—Monroe County Growers' Exch. v Harper, 103 So 600, 20 Ala.App. 532.

Evidence of original sales contract

An intervener may not prove his title to attached property by offering in evidence the original sales contract providing that he retains title until payment, along with oral evidence of purchase under the contract, but must further prove that the purchaser under the contract had not perfected his title by payment—General Motors Acceptance Corporation v. Judge of Circuit Court, Eleventh Judicial Circuit in and for Dade County, 136 So. 621, 102 Fla 924.

Evidence under general issue

In a statutory trial of the right of property where the only proper issue is affirmation by plaintiff that the property levied on is subject to the attachment, and a denial of that fact by the intervener, such issue is sufficient to authorize plaintiff to introduce evidence of every fact showing the property liable to the levy, and to authorize the intervener to give evidence of every fact showing that he has a superior right to the property—Millitello v B F Roden Grocery Co., 67 So. 420, 190 Ala 675

Jury entitled to know all the facts

Where a buyer of tomatoes, in an action against the seller, attached funds paid on draft, and the seller's bank filed an interplea claiming ownership of the funds, evidence as to the condition of the tomatoes on delivery was properly admitted, since the jury were entitled to all facts of the controversy—Townsend Wholesale Grocery Co. v. Chamberlain Canning Co., (Mo App) 277 S W. 958.

To prove sale

Testimony relating to a transaction between plaintiff and attachment defendant is competent and admissible to prove a sale of the property to the intervener—Frank v. Levi, 81 N.W. 459, 110 Iowa 267.

Use of automobile

In an action against a husband in which his wife intervened, claiming ownership of an attached automobile, evidence that the husband used the automobile in his employment was inadmissible, not tending to prove whether he owned, borrowed, or leased the automobile—Beaver Park Land & Water Co. v. Cowie, 189 P. 856, 68 Colo. 390.

15. Ramsey v. Federal Surety Co., 249 P. 137, 121 Okl. 177—6 C J. p 396 note 2.

Abandonment of claim

A contract apparently showing an abandonment by the intervener of his claim is admissible—Henderson v. Baker, 47 S W. 211, 20 Ky.L. 580

Draft and bill of lading

In an action by the drawee of a draft with bill of lading attached to recover damages for the drawer's breach of contract of sale with intervention by the bank at which it was payable claiming ownership of funds attached, where there was no controversy as to identity or form of the draft which plaintiff had paid, the draft was admissible—S Sternberg & Co v. Crohon & Roden Co., 90 S E 935, 172 N C. 731.

Priority

Where an intervener claims title to attached property by virtue of a mortgage prior to the levy of attachment, the attaching plaintiff may show by instrument that his lien is antecedent in date to intervener's mortgage—Boswell v. Carlisle, 55 Ala 554.

16. Ill—Hutchinson Nat. Bank v. Crow, 56 Ill App. 558.

6 C J. p 396 note 5.

Failure to plead a mortgage

(1) Where the intervener's affidavit of claim fails to state that the nature of his claim is through a mortgage, he may not recover as a mortgagee, and evidence tending to establish a mortgage is inadmissible. —Gulf Coast Lumber Co. v. Miles, 90 So. 281, 206 Ala. 429.

statement as to the actual contents, the levy is a levy on the barrel and contents; and, on trial of a claim case under such levy, it is not error to admit evidence as to the contents of each barrel.[19]

Although the intervener may show a bona fide sale and delivery of property by defendant in attachment to himself before plaintiff's lien attached by levy of attachment,[20] and the fact that the conveyance was recorded subsequent to the attachment will not necessarily render it inadmissible in evidence,[21] as a rule, evidence of matters occurring after the attachment of the property,[22] including bills of sale[23] and receipted bills dated after the levy,[24] is not admissible in a proceeding to try the right of a claimant thereto, at least where such matters have not been specially pleaded[25]

Acts, admissions, or declarations of parties. The acts or declarations of attachment defendant while in possession, tending to indicate or explain the character of his possession, are admissible,[26] if made in the presence of claimant,[27] but declarations of defendant after he has parted with his possession,[28] or subsequent to the levy and interposition of intervener's claim,[29] are inadmissible.

Declarations of a claimant tending to prove the validity of his title to property in controversy are not admissible in his favor,[30] but his oral[31] and written[32] admissions or declarations derogatory to his claim or title are admissible in evidence against him.

The testimony of a witness that he held possession of the goods for claimant but not for attachment defendant is admissible when the title of the latter is not well established.[33]

Affidavit and bond of claimant The affidavit[34] and bond given by claimant for the redelivery of the property[35] are admissible for plaintiff in attachment to prove the levy.

Proceedings in attachment. In a statutory trial of the right of property the writ of attachment is admissible in evidence against claimant,[36] and, if it is lost, its existence and contents may be proved by secondary evidence[37]

An inventory or appraisal attached by the levying officer to the return of a levy under an attachment and made a part thereof is competent evidence in a claim suit instituted to determine the rights of the parties to the property levied on,[38] as tending to prove the value of the property.[39]

Inasmuch as the question of the validity or invalidity of attachment plaintiff's claim against defendant does not arise on the trial of the right of property, it has been held that a judgment in an attachment suit would be inadmissible as evidence against claimant in a trial of the right of property.[40]

(2) Intervener's evidence that defendant in attachment had tendered produce in payment of rent for which the attachment was brought, that claimant furnished defendant merchandise to aid in making crop, that claimant's mortgage had not been paid, and that claimant had not been paid for ginning cotton which had been attached, was held inadmissible where the intervener's claim affidavit did not refer to the mortgage under which his claim was made, or the nature of the right claimed—Vest v First Joint Stock Land Bank, (Ala.) 163 So. 654

Greig, 180 N.W. 301, 190 Iowa 155.

Relationship of claimant and debtor. Evidence of the relationship between the intervener and one of defendants in attachment has been held inadmissible against the intervener,[41] but there is also authority for a contrary view.[42]

To contradict officer's return. The levying officer's return of the attachment is not conclusive against an intervening claimant of the property levied on, and evidence contradicting such return may be introduced on behalf of such claimant.[43]

To show fraud. The claimant may, on framing the proper issue, show that the judgment obtained by the attaching creditor against the debtor was obtained by collusion and fraud.[44]

Evidence tending to show that the title of the interpleader was fraudulently acquired is admissible,[45] although in some jurisdictions attaching plaintiff must prove defendant's indebtedness to him before he can attack the bona fides of the transfer.[46] The fraud must be proved by evidence other than the affidavit for attachment, which in some jurisdictions is held inadmissible for that purpose;[47] and, on the other hand, claimant cannot in rebuttal introduce his petition filed in an action against his debtor in a suit to which attaching creditor was not a party showing the consideration paid for the property.[48]

If claimant alleges that attachment defendant obtained the goods from him through fraud, collections made and disposition of assets by defendant prior to the levy are competent and admissible,[49] and claimant may likewise testify to statements made by defendant to obtain such credit from him.[50]

To show indebtedness to claimant. The account books of defendant in attachment have been held admissible to show the existence and amount of his indebtedness to the intervening claimant.[51]

To show title in third person. As an intervening claimant of property must recover on the strength of his own title, any evidence tending to show title in a third person not connected with the suit is inadmissible on his behalf,[52] unless in some proper way he connects himself with such outstanding title,[53] although the intervener may show that, before the attachment issued, defendant had sold the property to persons from whom the intervener purchased it, his purpose in such instance not being to claim the property as that of a third person.[54]

To show value of property. Evidence of the value of the property attached is relevant and admissible in a suit or proceeding between the attaching creditor and a claimant of the property,[55] and may be offered by either party.[56]

§ 361. —— Weight and Sufficiency

The party having the burden of an issue must establish it by a preponderance of the evidence, and such proof is sufficient.

As in other civil actions, the party in the proceeding having the affirmative of an issue must prove it by a preponderance of the evidence, and such proof is sufficient.[57] This evidence should be of a positive

Misdescription

Fraudulent claim of intervener
Where an attachment was levied on a motor truck and intervener claimed ownership of the truck, where plaintiff contended that the intervener's claim was fraudulent, testimony concerning goods found in intervener's home after a fire at defendant's store is inadmissible as that would not tend to prove the issue involved in the case —Paragould Wholesale Grocery Co v Middleton, 235 S W. 469, 208 Mo App. 592.

First Nat. Bank, 197 P. 257, 100 Or. 221.

(6) To show that a conveyance to defendant by trustee was prior to the attachment levy.—Horan v. Varian, 268 P. 637, 204 Cal. 391, recalled 276 P. 1002, 207 Cal. 7.

(7) Other examples of evidence held insufficient—6 C.J. p. 398 note 45 [b], p. 400 note 68 [a], [b].

Identity of property

The property covered by a mortgage conveying "all the dry goods, groceries, etc., kept in stock at the storehouses and warerooms" of the mortgagor, at a certain place, was sufficiently identified in an interplea by the mortgagee in attachment against the mortgagor by a showing that there was but one store at such place and that the sheriff attached all the goods therein—Rice v. Sally, 75 S.W. 398, 176 Mo. 107.

Property held not to be debtor's

The facts that the purchaser of chattels at an execution sale was a brother-in-law of the execution debtor, that the debtor's father-in-law's name was on the door where the goods were kept by the purchaser, that the latter was not engaged in a business to which the chattels would be suited, that the debtor had them in his possession and was selling them at the time plaintiffs attached them as the debtor's property, and that the debtor's brothers secured the purchaser's bond to retain the property, have been held not to be evidence of a transfer of the property from the purchaser to the debtor after the execution sale so as to warrant an attachment of it as the property of the debtor—Lipschitz v Halperin, 103 N.Y.S. 202, 53 Misc. 280.

58. Perkins v. Lyons, 82 N.W. 486, 111 Iowa 192.

Fraud

Where claimant alleges fraud on the part of the attachment debtor, evidence of a general nature founded largely upon supposition will be insufficient on his part—Perkins v. Lyons, 82 N.W. 486, 111 Iowa 192.

Slight circumstances

Where the debtor's title to property attached is shown only by slight circumstances and opinions of witnesses, and the unimpeached evidence of the claimant is unequivocal the property was in defendant's possession at the time of attachment,[59] or that defendant in attachment had previously represented himself as the owner,[60] is sufficient to make out a prima facie case for the attaching plaintiff.

A mere showing of admissions of defendant in favor of claimant's title and a surrender of possession to claimant a few hours before the levy does not overcome the prima facie case which the possession by attachment defendant on the date of the levy and for some time previous, and the use of the property apparently as his own, makes against claimant.[61] An admission by claimant that the property attached is that of defendant in attachment also operates to make a prima facie case against claimant on the question of ownership.[62] Where the return of the levy under the attachment does not recite that the property was found in the possession of defendant in attachment, the attaching creditor successfully carries the burden of proof by showing affirmatively that defendant in attachment was vested with the title to such property at or before the time of the levy.[63]

A judgment condemning the property levied on to be sold is prima facie evidence in a suit between the attaching creditor and a claimant that the title to the property was in defendant in attachment,[64] but is not conclusive[65]

On the other hand, a claimant to attached property may establish a prima facie case by showing that the property was in his possession at the time it was attached.[66]

Since a claimant of attached property must recover on the strength of his own title, it is sufficient if the attaching creditor shows that the property does not belong to claimant.[67] Claimant, however, is not required to prove his title beyond a reasonable doubt,[68] and, although his evidence is such that a demurrer might be sustained thereto; yet, if the creditor's evidence shows for claimant a prima facie case of ownership, the judgment must be in his favor.[69]

Where a claimant interposes a claim to certain goods under each of two different attachments, a payment of the assessed value of the goods under one claim does not of itself sustain his claim under the second attachment[70]

Where, in an attachment suit on the ground of fraud in disposing of property, defendant makes default, he admits the fraud, and it is only necessary to connect the interpleader with it by showing knowledge in himself or his agent, or both;[71] but the judgment against attachment defendant is not prima facie evidence that the sale to claimant was fraudulent.[72]

The value of attached property as assessed under direction of statute by the officer levying the writ is to be taken as correct, in the absence of other eviboth as to her possession and title, a verdict finding the property subject is contrary to law—Smith v McCranie, 82 S E 807, 14 Ga App 721—6 C J p 400 note 68.

Burden not sustained

Claimant to property seized under attachment was held not to have sustained the burden of proof required of a third party claiming property taken from the possession of one other than claimant—Concrete Machinery & Supply Co v. Waara, (Ariz) 27 P (2d) 682.

Possession at time of levy

(1) Where the sheriff swears that he attached property while it was on the place cultivated by defendant, and that it was part of the crop raised by defendant that year, a prima facie case is raised for the attaching plaintiff—British Mortgage Co v. Cody, 33 So 832, 135 Ala 622

(2) Even though, shortly prior to the levy, defendant in attachment gave a bill of sale to the intervener who made part payment therefor, the fact that defendant's bailee held possession of the goods at the time they were attached creates a prima facie case for the attaching plaintiff—Floege v Wiedner, 14 S.W. 132, 77 Tex. 311.

Possession of husband

Evidence that household property was stored when the husband and his family moved, and that the husband returned such property for taxation makes out a prima facie case of title in the husband, authorizing a finding for the plaintiff in attachment—Blount v. Dunlap, 130 S E 693, 34 Ga App 666.

dence thereon.[73]

Indebtedness. Although it has been held that the attachment proceedings are sufficient proof of the attachment defendant's indebtedness to the creditor,[74] at least where attachment defendant was in possession of the property at the time of the levy,[75] according to other authority the mere bringing of a suit upon an alleged debt is no evidence of an indebtedness as against a third person claiming property attached in the action;[76] nor are the affidavit, bond, and other papers in attachment evidence of any indebtedness due plaintiff.[77]

Validity of writ. The writ of attachment itself is sufficient evidence of its own validity where it is not attacked by special plea.[78]

§ 362. Trial

a. In general
b. Questions of law and fact
c. Instructions
d. Verdict or findings

a. In General

Where a person other than defendant claims property attached as that of defendant, the trial of the right to such property should be in accordance with the statutes of the jurisdiction.

Where a person not a party to the proceedings claims property which has been seized under the writ, the trial of the right to the property should be in accordance with the statutes of the particular jurisdiction.[79] Under some statutes issues made by the interpleader should be tried and determined as like issues between plaintiff and defendant;[80] and where there are several claiming liens against attached property, the issues raised between interpleaders should be tried and determined, and the property awarded to the rightful claimant.[81]

Where there is no conflicting claim as to title, an adjudication of title before the hearing on the attachment issues is not necessary.[82] In the absence of a statute prescribing the procedure, while it may be the better practice to have the matter of the interpleader settled first and then render judgment on the attachment suit,[83] it is not necessary to do so, as the court has ample power to protect the true owner from sale of the property under the attachment in case the issues as to ownership are found for him on his interpleader, even though judgment in the original suit is entered before determination of the issues raised by the interpleader.[84] It has also been held that in attachment, wherein an intervener claiming title to the property attached is interested only in the issue of title, it rests in the discretion of the court whether or not such intervener be given a separate trial.[85] Of course, if a statute prescribes the order in which the interpleader and the principal action shall be tried, the statutory procedure should be followed. Accordingly, where the statute so provides, the right to the attached property must be tried prior to the determination of the rights of the parties to the original action;[86] while under others it may not be tried until the attachment suit has been prosecuted to judgment.[87]

In New Jersey

In trying the right of property taken by a sheriff by virtue of a writ of attachment, that officer may determine the admissibility of evidence, but has no power to direct a verdict, but only to conduct the inquisition as prescribed by statute, and there is a statutory distinction between such proceeding and one where the sheriff's taking is by virtue of an execution to enforce a judgment, in the latter proceeding the inquisition is to be tried by a judge of the common pleas court as any other case of trial by jury—Brown v. Christian, 117 A. 294, 97 N J Law 56.

Return of writ, affidavit and bond

In an attachment proceeding, it is only where the writ, affidavit, and bond have been returned into court that the court has authority, under Code (1907) § 6040, to make up an issue between plaintiff and claimant.—Key v. Haynes, 34 So. 563, 17 Ala. App. 229.

Retention of property on bond

An act authorizing the attaching creditor, in cases of intervention, to retain the property attached upon giving bond to produce it, does not require trial at that time of the issue of ownership—Kupperman v. Moore, (La.App) 166 So 519

87. Mahaffey Co. v. Russell & But-

In a proper case an attachment may be dissolved on an interpleader's motion to dissolve rather than on the issues raised by the interpleader's answer, particularly where there is no request that the controverted facts should be submitted to a jury.[88] Where, however, the showing upon the motion discloses a substantial question as to ownership between defendant and interpleader, a motion to dissolve should be overruled, as that question should be determined upon a fuller hearing than is possible upon an ex parte hearing upon affidavits.[89]

Consolidation. Where two interventions in an attachment proceeding are so closely related that they could be treated as a joint intervention, it is not error to consolidate them for trial together,[90] and where different parties levy attachments on the same property the causes for a trial of the right of property may be consolidated, although claimant has given separate bonds to the creditors,[91] but a failure so to consolidate cannot be availed of as error, where no injury has resulted therefrom.[92]

Right to jury trial. Where, under the constitution of the state, a jury trial is not a matter of right in a special proceeding unless a jury trial therein was a matter of right at common law, in the absence of a statute providing for a jury trial in a proceeding to establish title or recover possession of attached property, a jury trial therein is not a matter of right.[93] Where, however, a statute requires the court upon the filing of an interplea to impanel a jury to try the right of property, a jury trial on that issue may be had as a matter of right, and any party to the proceeding may insist upon a jury trial, unless the right of a jury trial so given is waived,[94] or unless the pleadings present only a question of law.[95] Although there is authority to the contrary,[96] the claimant of the attached property having, as a rule, the affirmative of the issue and the burden of proof, has generally the right to open and close;[97] but where the state of the case is such that the affirmative of the issue and the burden of proof has devolved upon the attaching plaintiff, this carries with it the right to open and close.[98]

Opening statement. Plaintiff, in his opening statement in a proceeding for attachment in which a party claiming the property interpleaded, may read his petition filed against defendant in the action.[99]

b. Questions of Law and Fact

Questions of law are for the determination of the court, while questions of fact are for the jury in the case of a jury trial.

In accordance with the rules governing civil actions generally, questions of law are for the court, while questions of fact are for the jury to determine. Where the facts are clear and undisputed, a question of law is presented,[1] and under such circumstances the court may properly direct a verdict.[2] Where the title or lien of claimant rests upon documentary evidence,[3] and where the court finds, as a

Property in defendant's possession

Claimant has the right to open and close where he admits the property was in defendant's possession at the time of the levy—Atkinson v. J. B. Colt Co, 145 S.E. 455, 167 Ga. 287—64 C.J. p 81 note 1.

Direction of verdict proper

Where the evidence showed that claimant held title to attached property under a conditional sale and that he had not been paid therefor, and where the evidence showed that plaintiff did not possess such a right as to entitle him to take advantage of claimant's failure to register his conditional sale, the direction of verdict for claimant was proper—Levinson v. Godfrey, 74 A. 278, 79 N.J. Law 212.

Direction held improper

Where there is evidence that claimant acquired his title fraudulently, it is error for the court to direct a verdict in his favor—Meridian Fertilizer Factory v. Bush, 27 So 645, 77 Miss. 697—Burns v. Woolery, 45 P. 894, 15 Wash. 134 matter of law, that the deed upon which intervener bases his claim is void,[4] there is nothing for the jury to decide. Whether the facts justify intervention at all is a question of law for the court.[5]

3. Yellow Pine Lumber Co. v. Mays, 94 S.E. 42, 81 W.Va. 46.

On the other hand, issues upon which the evidence is conflicting are for the determination of the jury, or the trial court in the absence of a jury,[6] and where there is substantial conflicting evidence the verdict should not be directed.[7] Accordingly, upon conflicting evidence, claimant's ownership,[8] and the bona fides of his claim,[9] the amount due claimant,[10] whether claimant was induced by fraud to make a sale to defendant in attachment which he claims the right to rescind[11] or participated in the debtor's fraud in transferring property to him,[12] whether an intervening bank held a draft as a purchaser for value or merely for collection,[13] whether there was such a depreciation in the value of the attached property as authorized a mortgagee thereof to take possession under a provision in the mortgage authorizing him to do so in case of an unreasonable depreciation in value,[14] whether a mortgage was executed on certain property and secured a certain note, and whether the mortgaged and attached chattels were identical,[15] whether a note sued on was still due and unpaid[16] and, if unpaid, the amount due thereon,[17] whether the mortgaged property was the same as that sold under attachment,[18] and the attaching creditor's knowledge that a third person owned the property levied on,[19] are questions for the jury, and their finding thereon either way should not be disturbed.[20] The credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given evidence are also facts to be determined by the jury.[21]

c. Instructions

Instructions should be given on the law applicable to the issues and the evidence, and should not be confusing or misleading, or invade the province of the jury.

In general, instructions should be drawn so that the jurors, as laymen, can understand them, leaving nothing to their interpretation as to the meaning of the court or the duties of the jury.[22] The instructions should define to the jury the issues which

Not objectionable as lecture

Full and complete instructions are not objectionable as being a lecture to the jury, as, in a sense, every instruction is a lecture to the jury as to the law of the case.—Gate City Nat. Bank v. Boyer, 142 S.W. 487, 161 Mo.App. 143.

are for their consideration,[23] should be so framed as to confine their attention to the issue made by the pleadings[24] and the evidence adduced in the case,[25] and should correctly state the law with reference to the various matters presented,[26] and may state the effect of certain evidence, if believed by the jury,[27] that certain allegations are admitted,[28] and what the verdict should be upon a particular state of facts.[29] The instructions given by the court should not in any manner invade the province of the jury by withdrawing from its consideration any question of fact,[30] nor should they be conflicting,[31] confusing,[32] misleading,[33] or argumentative,[34] or in any way prejudicial to either party.[35]

d. Verdict or Findings

The verdict should be free from uncertainty, responsive to the issues and evidence, and dispose of all the issues.

The verdict should be that of the jury,[36] and should be free from uncertainty,[37] ambiguity,[38] and responsive to the issue or issues,[39] the evidence,[40] and the charge of the court,[41] and must dispose of the whole issue submitted to the jury.[42]

In case of special ownership or partial interest in the property or its proceeds where there is a privity of title between claimant and attachment defendant, the jury should make a finding as to the extent of claimant's interest therein if they have found that the attached property belongs to him;[43] but unless a special interest is claimed the amount of claimant's interest in the property need not be stated.[44]

Where, on an issue as to whether the claimant of attached property was the owner, a verdict was returned that the jury found for plaintiff in the exact amount of plaintiff's debt, it was held that such sum should be treated as surplusage, and the verdict sustained as an adverse finding on the issue of claimant's title.[45]

Where several claim suits are pending in the same tribunal, each presenting precisely the same issues on the record, and the determination of these issues depends on precisely the same evidence in each case, an agreement of all parties that a verdict in one case actually submitted to the jury shall be the verdict in all of the cases has the effect of making the finding in the case that is actually tried regular and valid in all of them.[46]

Where the verdict is neither responsive to the issues nor supported by the evidence, it will be set aside;[47] but the fact that a verdict is insufficient does not entitle an interpleader to file a second interplea, nor after such a verdict and a judgment thereon in his favor, can his name be struck from the docket without his consent.[48] The determination by a sheriff's jury as to the validity of the claim made by a third person to property levied upon under an attachment is not such a judicial determination as entitles either party to review it by a motion to set aside the verdict.[49]

It is not necessary to assess the value of the property claimed,[50] unless the statute so requires,[51] and a finding as to the value of the property may be disregarded as surplusage.[52]

Where the verdict as returned by the jury is responsive to the issue which has been tried, and the intent of the jury is clear, the court may, and should, correct it in matters of form and detail, but it must not amend it in such a manner as to change its meaning or effect,[53] and, where an amendment to the verdict is permissible, it may be made after the jury has been discharged.[54]

§ 363. Judgment and Enforcement Thereof

a. In general
b. Where claimant is successful
c. Where claimant is unsuccessful
d. Amendment or reformation
e. Effect of judgment
f. Execution

a. In General

There must be a judgment in accordance with the statute, conforming to the verdict, and in accordance with the pleadings and evidence adduced at the trial.

In a proceeding to try the right to property attached and claimed by a third person, where the court has proper jurisdiction,[55] there must be a judgment[56] founded on a regular and valid verdict, to which the judgment must conform.[57] The judgment should, furthermore, be in accordance with any statutory provisions on the subject,[58] although it has been held that a judgment not following the statute strictly will not be reversed for that reason, where no injury has resulted to claimant.[59]

The judgment must not allow relief not asked for or covered in the pleadings,[60] and it must be in accord with the evidence adduced at the trial.[61]

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, judgment may be, and usually is, rendered on the interpleader or intervention independently of the attachment suit.[62]

Surplusage in the findings of the jury should be ignored in writing the judgment.[63]

Where sureties have intervened and defended claimant's rights, judgment may be rendered in their behalf, although it inures to the benefit of claimant.[64]

Sufficiency of assessment

Where property is levied on under a writ of attachment, and the court finds that only one bale of cotton levied on is liable to the satisfaction of the writ and assesses its value, there is a full compliance with Code (1907) § 6041, where a third party claimant has possession of the balance of the property under his bond—Home Guano Co. v. Judgment beyond prayer of petition

Where prayer of petition of party intervening in the sale of attached property did not mention the intervener's mortgage, the relief allowed under the mortgage would be beyond prayer of petition—Consolidated Cos. v. Laws, 124 So. 775, 11 La.App. 676.

Facts not in evidence

In action for possession of an automobile attached as property of a third person, a judgment denying possession to plaintiff and giving it to a third person, based on a purported assignment by liens filed after the case was submitted was erroneous—Bunnell v. Thomas, 165 P. 1047, 33 Cal.App. 634.

Judgment against weight of evidence

Judgment for an intervener who offers no evidence in the trial is clearly erroneous, where plaintiff in attachment proves the property levied on was in defendant's possession at the time of the levy.—Barnes v. Montgomery, (Ala.App.) 153 So. 661.

64. Boehm v. Calusch, (Tex.) 3 S.W. 293.

Assessment of value of property. Where the value of the property is immaterial, it may be ignored in writing the judgment,[65] although, where the statute so requires, an assessment of the value of the property may be necessary.[66] Where the statute provides that the value of the property in controversy shall be assessed as of the time of the interposition of the claim, an assessment of value as of any other time is improper.[67]

Where the property has been sold, it is proper that the amount realized by the sale should be ascertained by the court.[68]

b. Where Claimant Is Successful

Ordinarily, under the statutes, where claimant is successful, the judgment should be that the attachment be vacated or the proceeds of the property, if it has been sold, be turned over to claimant.

Of course, where claimant is successful in establishing his claim or interest in the attached property, the judgment entered should be in accordance with the controlling statute. Ordinarily, under the statutes, where claimant or intervener succeeds in establishing his title to the property attached, the judgment should be that the attachment be vacated[69] as to both the intervener and defendant in attachment,[70] and the property returned to the true owner,[71] and the court should make such orders as are necessary to protect the rights of claimant.[72] In the absence of a statute enabling the court to award further relief,[73] where the property attached has been sold and the proceeds of the sale are in the hands of the proper officer, judgment should be that claimant have and recover the proceeds arising from the sale of the goods by such officer, who should be ordered to pay the proceeds to claimant;[74] and it is erroneous to enter judgment for value of the property against plaintiff in attachment.[75] Where claimant establishes a prior right to the proceeds of the attached property, or a prior lien thereon, judgment should not be entered against attaching plaintiff therefor, since if claimant is entitled to personal relief, he must obtain it against attachment defendant,[76] and he should not receive judgment for a greater portion of the proceeds than is necessary to compensate him.[77]

In an equitable proceeding by interveners to establish the priority of their claims, judgment may, if asked for by claimant, be rendered against the debtor for a claim admitted by him.[78]

Where claimant has established his title as a trustee in a valid trust deed, the attachment creditor is not entitled to a judgment against claimant and the sureties on his delivery bond for the value of the property after deducting the amount of the valid debts secured by the trust deed, because there is a surplus after making such deduction.[79]

On a finding that the property is subject to a valid mortgage, a judgment in favor of claimant should not discharge the attachment lien, but should direct that the mortgagee retain possession until the mortgage has been discharged and that the attaching creditor may sell subject to the mortgage, in the manner provided by statute.[80]

c. Where Claimant Is Unsuccessful

Under some statutes, where claimant is unsuccessful, the judgment should condemn the property to the satisfaction of any judgment obtained in the attachment proceedings, although under other statutes judgment may be rendered against claimant and the sureties on his bond on breach of its conditions.

Where the issue is found against claimant, the judgment should, under some statutes, condemn the property to the satisfaction of the judgment which has been, or may be, obtained in the attachment suit;[81] and it is not proper to render a money judgment against claimant,[82] or to direct that he and his sureties on the claim bond pay plaintiff in attachment the value of the property as assessed by the jury and the costs of suit.[83] Under other statutes, however, judgment may be rendered against claimant and his sureties on the bond, in the event of its forfeiture or breach of condition.[84] Where the statute permits the rendering of a personal judgment against claimant, judgment may be rendered for plaintiff in attachment for the amount of his debt, instead of the value of the property, where the debt is less than such value.[85] Where the statute so provides, the rendering of a money judgment against an intervener replevying the attached property, on judgment going against him, is proper, without providing in the alternative for a return of the property.[86]

Under some statutes, in a trial of the right to attached property, an "order of dismissal" is in effect an adjudication of the failure on claimant's part to establish his right to the property as against the attaching creditor, and places the duty on claimant to make return of the property.[87]

A judgment in favor of several attaching plaintiffs should not be joint, but should establish their rights and priorities.[88]

Where claimant received a portion of his claim on a sale of the property, in accordance with an agreement under which he permitted a sale thereof, a judgment based on a finding that his claim was invalid should contain a provision establishing his right to the money he has received from the sale, as against the other parties, where an advantage has been secured to them by reason of the sale.[89]

Where claimant fails to appear and join the issue, judgment by default may be had against him like any other defendant,[90] although where the intervener files his bond and oath, enters his appearance, and requests an order directing issues, no default judgment can be rendered against him until he refuses to join issues under direction of the court.[91]

A sheriff who successfully defends a replevin action brought for property seized by him on an order of attachment, where the property has been taken away from him under the order of delivery, is entitled to an alternative money judgment for the amount of the lien, in case it is less than the full value of the property; otherwise for the actual value.[92]

d. Amendment or Reformation

In a proper case the judgment may be amended or reformed.

In the event of a clerical misprision, the judgment may be amended on motion,[93] or, where necessary, it may be reformed.[94]

e. Effect of Judgment

The judgment is conclusive between the parties.

The judgment on the trial of the right to property levied on and claimed by a third person is conclusive, as between attaching plaintiff and claimant, on the question as to whether or not claimant owns or has an interest in the property,[95] and is also held to bind the sureties on claimant's bond in the event that the property in controversy is not forthcoming, or the value thereof is not paid by claimant.[96]

96. Trieste v Enslen, 17 So 356, 105 Ala 180, citing Charles v Haskins, 14 Iowa 471, 83 Am D. 378.

An intervener who replevies the property on a forthcoming bond and who is sued on the bond after a judgment against his interests is estopped to set up any contention raised by him in the claim case,[97] and a judgment in favor of the intervener estops plaintiff in attachment from ignoring or denying the possession of the intervener,[98] and gives notice of the intervener's rights to purchasers of the property, who must be governed thereby.[99]

Since the action in which judgment in the intervention suit is rendered is independent of the main suit, with separate and distinct issues, the judgment does not affect the attachment suit,[1] nor does it affect the title to the property as between attachment defendant and the intervener.[2]

Where the value of improvements is awarded to an intervener, he is not entitled to retain possession of the land until the improvements have been paid for, as against an attaching creditor.[3]

Judgment for claimant in an action against the attaching officer is not binding on the attaching creditor unless he has had notice of the action.[4]

f. Execution

Where the statute so permits, plaintiff may have execution issue on the judgment.

Where attached property is claimed by a third person who gives the required claim bond, and thereafter the attaching creditor prevails on a trial of the right of property between himself and claimant, it is error to direct the issuance of an execution before the return of the claim bond forfeited,[5] but, where the statute permits judgment to be entered in the proceeding to try the right of property against claimant and the sureties on his bond, plaintiff may have execution issue on such judgment.[6]

§ 364. Appeal and Error

Generally, third persons claiming property attached as that of another may appeal, and the appeal will be governed by the rules applicable to other civil appeals.

Generally, the parties to a proceeding to establish or determine a third person's claim to attached property have the same right of appeal as in actions commenced in an ordinary way,[7] even though the right to appeal is not expressly given by the statute authorizing claimant to intervene or interplead in the attachment suit.[8] In the absence of a statute providing for review of the action of a sheriff's jury, however, it has been held that no appeal will lie therefrom.[9]

In accordance with the general rules governing appeals in civil actions, parties to an appeal are bound by the positions which they held at the trial,[10] and when a proceeding by intervention in attachment is treated by the trial court as not necessarily equitable, it will be regarded in the same light in the appellate court.[11] Also, if attachment plaintiff fails to recover judgment, the exclusion of evidence of the value of attached property would not be an error for which he could complain,[12] although, if the validity of the conveyance to claimant of attached property is assailed, the exclusion of evidence showing the value of the property would not be harmless but would be reversible error.[13]

To what court appeal lies. The appeal must, of course, be taken to a court having proper jurisdiction; thus, where a question involving the title to land is in issue, appeal must be taken to that court alone which has jurisdiction as to such question;[14] and the same principle applies where the jurisdiction of the appellate court is dependent on the amount in controversy, which, for the purpose of defining the jurisdiction of the courts, has been interpreted as the value of the property attached, and not the amount of the claim sued on.[15]

Parties. Where there is judgment against the intervener and defendant in attachment, the intervener must himself appeal, and an appeal by attachment defendant is not sufficient to bring up the question of ownership.[16]

Time for appeal. The appeal must be taken and perfected or the writ of error sued out within the time prescribed therefor by statute.[17]

Supersedeas or stay of proceedings. Where a bond is given by claimant, the pendency of the appeal operates as a supersedeas, and the attaching officer is not liable for failure to levy an execution issued against the property interpleaded.[18]

Record. The record on appeal in proceedings to try the right to property attached must be kept distinct from the record of the proceedings in attachment,[19] and must show that an issue has been made up between claimant and attaching creditor.[20] Where a claim is interposed by one partner in the name of his firm, subsequent proceedings are properly conducted against the partnership as claimant, notwithstanding the bond is given by each partner individually and recites that he "has filed a claim," and, accordingly, a recital in the judgment entry that the one interposing the claim is a member of the partnership is sufficient, on error, to sustain a default against the partnership as claimant.[21]

Scope and extent of review. Where the question at issue on trial was the right to the attached property, the appellate court can pass on that question only [22]

Since only where there is a flagrant abuse of its authority by the trial court will the appellate court review matters involving the trial court's discretion, the appellate court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court in refusing permission to interplead after the time for interpleading has passed,[23] with the trial court's decision allowing a judgment creditor to join issue on a third party claim after the term to which the garnishment is returnable,[24] or with the trial court's decision to dismiss an interplea in attachment for want of notice of filing [25]

The appellate court will not consider questions of fact which have been determined by the jury,[26] or consider objections not raised in the trial court;[27] neither will it look into the attachment for the purpose of finding error in the claim suit, unless the record of the former is introduced in some legitimate way into the latter.[28]

Where it appears from a recital in a verdict not assessing each item of property, in a trial of the right to property, that there was an agreement of the parties by which the jury was to be governed in their findings, it will be presumed on appeal, in the absence of a contrary showing, that the agreement dispensed with the necessity of assessing each separate item of the property.[29]

§ 365. Costs

The costs of an intervention proceeding must generally be assessed to the losing party.

Costs and disbursements in a proceeding to try the right to property levied on under attachment and claimed by a third person have no connection with the main action,[30] and must, as a rule, be borne by the party to such proceeding who is unsuccessful,[31] although it has been held that all the costs may be imposed on claimant who is partly successful.[32]

One who claims as trustee under a deed of trust which is satisfied pending trial is entitled to costs accruing prior to such satisfaction.[33]

Claimant successful

In an attachment suit where claimant is successful in sustaining his claim to part of the property, it is error to adjudge the costs of the suit against him, although the attachment be sustained in all other particulars.—Whitaker v Blain Mooreman & Co., 2 Ky.Op. 238

32. Stewart v. Outhwaite, 44 S W. 326, 141 Mo 562

33. Helm v. Gray, 59 Miss. 54.

Expenses of custody or sale. An attaching creditor of an insolvent corporation, who refuses on demand to deliver the property attached to a receiver subsequently appointed for the corporation, and who resists the receiver's action to recover it in an attempt to enforce his preference, will not, on recovery by the receiver, be allowed the costs of the attachment and care of the property.[34] Where the property is sold by agreement of the parties, the attaching officer may retain the expenses of sale and the custody of the property, until sold, from the date of the agreement, and claimant, if successful, must look to plaintiff in attachment for his reimbursement.[35]

Under a statute providing that, in cases of attachment, any person having a claim against defendant for labor done may give notice thereof, and that, unless the claim is disputed, it must be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, and, if disputed, an action must be begun within ten days for the recovery thereof, where the court subsequently to the filing of claims makes an order allowing compensation to the sheriff for caring for the attached property, the compensation is properly allowed as part of the costs in the judgment, since the rights acquired by filing claims are purely statutory, and there can, therefore, be no trust fund created in the hands of the sheriff which can not be subjected to any lawful order of the court with reference to fees.[36]

Attorney's fees. Where an intervener has to go into court to prove his title and has to employ counsel in doing so, he will be entitled to reasonable attorney's fees.[37]

Likewise, where a chattel mortgagee interposes a claim in attachment proceedings and the mortgage provides for a reasonable attorney's fee, the allowance of an amount which plaintiff's attorney has admitted at the trial to be reasonable is not error.[38]

Security for costs. Under some statutes it is within the discretion of the court when claimant's issue is made in attachment proceedings to require claimant to file security for costs incurred by reason of his claim.[39]

§ 366. Damages

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, as a general rule, damages cannot be recovered in a proceeding to try the right to attached property, although, where the statute so permits, damages are recoverable in such a proceeding.

The general rule, in the absence of statute, is that claimant cannot recover damages for the invasion of his rights by the seizure and detention of the property, except by an independent action brought for this purpose.[40] Under a permissive statute, however, an intervener who has established his right to property attached as that of another may recover the damages he has suffered by reason of the attachment,[41] and under such circumstances the measure of damages has been held to be the value of the attached property with interest from the date of attachment.[42] Where the attached property has been sold on plaintiff's application without the consent of the interpleader, it has also been held that his recovery should be the value of the property attached and damages for taking and withholding it.[43] Attorney's fees are generally not allowable as an element of damages,[44] although it has been held that attorney's fees incurred in suing out an injunction to prevent the sale of property wrongfully seized are recoverable as an element of damage.[45] That an attachment injured the intervener's credit and caused him to keep idle an employee under pay are items too remote to be considered in assessing damages.[46]

Where, under the statutes, damages may be recovered by the intervener, it does not necessarily follow from the fact that the sheriff cannot be held for the damages that the attaching creditor cannot be held liable, particularly when he persists in the seizure, after being apprised of claimant's rights, and provides an indemnity bond to the sheriff to prevent a release of the property from seizure.[47]

Under some statutes damages may be recovered, in a proceeding to try the right to attached property, against an unsuccessful claimant,[48] but in such a proceeding the statutory damages alone may be recovered.[49]

In an independent action brought by attachment plaintiff, an intervener in the attachment proceedings will be held liable for whatever damages plaintiff sustained from the conversion of the property accomplished by the procuring of the unlawful release of the property from the lien of the attachment.[50]

B. CLAIMANT'S BOND OR OTHER SECURITY FOR POSSESSION OR RELEASE OF PROPERTY

1. In General

§ 367. Right to Obtain Release of Property on Giving Bond

Where the statute permits, a claimant of attached property may secure its release by giving bond.

The statutes sometimes allow a claimant of property attached under process against another to obtain a release of the property and possession thereof by giving bond to return the same, or its value, in case he shall fail to establish his title or interest,[51] and under such a statute the giving of a sufficient bond is jurisdictional.[52] In the absence of such statutory permission, however, a claimant cannot obtain the release of property in this manner,[53] and, according to some authority, an instrument given by an intervener for that purpose is not a judicial bond and cannot be recovered on as such,[54] although according to other authority the fact that the statute does not provide for the release of the property by such procedure does not prevent liability on such a bond, which was voluntarily given and the property released thereon, as such a bond is not void as one exacted by an officer without authority of law.[55]

In the absence of a statute so requiring, a person seeking to intervene in attachment proceedings need not give bond,[56] and even where a release of the attached property may be secured on giving bond, if a release is not sought, bond is unnecessary.[57]

Where one claiming to be the owner of personalty attached as the property of another gives a forthcoming bond, this does not entitle him to retain the property as against a subsequent attachment creditor while such bond is in force, unless he gives another forthcoming bond.[58]

A deposit in court in lieu of a claimant's bond cannot be made in some jurisdictions,[59] although the practice seems to be permissible in other states.[60]

§ 368. Form and Requisites of Bond

The intervener's bond should comply substantially with the form required by statute.

A bond which complies substantially with statutory requirements is sufficient,[61] and a bond which is insufficient under the statute may be construed

Bond held sufficient

A bond signed by three persons binding themselves to the obligor for the payment of two hundred ninety-four dollars "to the effect and enforced as a common-law obligation [62]

As a general rule the bond is conditioned that claimant will have the property forthcoming to answer the judgment in the attachment suit if found liable therefor, and also for the payment of costs and damages occasioned by the institution of his claim [63] The fact that a bond states that it is intended as a delivery bond will not, if the prescribed statutory conditions of such a bond are omitted, entitle a claimant to possession of the property;[64] but a failure of the bond to comply strictly with the statute cannot be taken advantage of by the obligors after having obtained possession [65]

Amount. The amount of the bond, while dependent wholly upon statute, is usually double the appraised value of the property,[66] and it has been considered that a bond for a less amount is insufficient, although it is for more than double the amount of the debt for which the attachment was issued [67]

Obligee. Whether the bond should be made payable to plaintiff in attachment or to the attaching officer is a matter as to which the statute governs,[68] and, under a statute requiring the bond to be filed with the attaching officer, it is sufficient if the bond is made payable to the party for whose security it was executed.[69]

Where the statutes provide for a bond payable to plaintiff and the property is seized under several attachments, the bond may be payable to all plaintiffs jointly and severally,[70] or to all jointly instead of jointly and severally.[71] After possession of the property has been delivered on the faith of the bond and it has been sold, it is too late to raise an objection that no bond was executed to one who owned the property jointly with the debtor [72]

Execution. The signature of a partnership or firm name as surety on a claimant's bond has been held valid, although the names of the individual partners were not signed.[73]

§ 369. —— Amendment

An improperly framed bond may be amended on leave.

If the bond has been improperly framed the court may give leave to amend it before entering upon the trial.[74]

§ 370. —— Waiver of Defects

Defects in the intervener's bond may be waived by the party for whose benefit it was intended.

Since the bond is intended for the security and benefit of the attaching plaintiff, he may waive defects therein by his actions in failing to object to alleged defects at the proper stage of the proceedings,[75] and formal defects in the claimant's bond are waived if it is accepted and treated as valid.[76] Failure of claimant to have the bond approved may be waived by plaintiff.[77]

§ 371. Filing of Bond

An officer's failure to perform his duty and file a bond given him does not affect claimant's rights.

Where the officer is as much the agent of attachment plaintiff as of claimant, his failure to file the bond until some months after its delivery to him does not affect claimant's right to the property.[78] that we will pay all damages sustained by reason of the detention or sale of such property" was upheld, although not a model bond —Nokes v. Switzer, 10 N W 536, 12 Neb. 156

Compliance with statute

Waiver by failure to object

Where for eight years the plaintiff treated the bond as one for the trial of the right to attached cotton, and, after the intervener had parted with the cotton, repudiated it as a claim bond, insisting that it was a replevin bond, his failure to make timely objection waived the defects in the bond —Rhodes & Broadfoot v. Smith, 66 Ala. 174.

78. Mayer v. Woolery, 39 P. 135, 16 Wash 354.

The filing of the bond by claimant may be waived by plaintiff.[79] In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a failure to indorse the fact and time of filing on the bond is immaterial.[80]

§ 372. Operation and Effect of Bond

The giving of bond by claimant for the release of the property gives the court jurisdiction to hear and determine the intervention, it admits the validity of the attachment, and does not operate to discharge the attachment lien.

The giving of the bond operates to give the court jurisdiction to hear and determine the action of intervention.[81]

In accordance with the rule that the regularity of the attachment is not in issue in the trial of the right to the property, as already discussed in § 357c (1), it has been held that claimant by filing his bond admits the fact and validity of the levy.[82]

The effect of the giving of a claimant's bond is to substitute the undertaking for the attached property, and the action may proceed to determination, although the title to the attached property has not been determined.[83] The execution of a delivery bond by a claimant of attached property does not as a rule discharge the lien created by the levy,[84] and, under some statutes, claimant must make himself a party to the attachment action or be concluded by the judgment therein.[85] However, it has been held that the execution of a bond to perform the judgment of the court discharges the attachment,[86] and, where a claimant procures a release of attached property by depositing a sum of money to secure plaintiff's recovery, it has also been held that the attachment is thereby discharged.[87]

Where the statute so provides, the property, after the bond is given and in the hands of the claimant, is in custodia legis in the sense that the intervener's possession is protected against levies from any source, excepting subsequent writs against the original defendant in attachment,[88] until the statutory claim suit is determined.[89]

Effect on subsequent claims. The execution of a bond by an intervener does not bar the interposition of other claims,[90] and, if claimant would retain the property against a subsequently attaching creditor, under some statutes he must give another forthcoming bond to the latter,[91] although under other statutes an additional bond is not necessary.[92]

Presumption as to nature of custody of claimant. Where one claiming attached property executed a delivery bond and receipted for the property to the officer, the presumption is that he retained it under his bond and not as custodian or receiptor at common law.[93]

§ 373. Release of Security

Security which has been given for the release of attached property will not be returned or released merely on the filing of a motion therefor.

Where property alleged to belong to defendant was released from attachment on a claimant's depositing a sum of money to secure plaintiff's recovery and the property was thereupon returned to the claimant, the court in which the attachment was pending had no jurisdiction, in the absence of fraud, on motion, to enter an order discharging the same or releasing the deposit on affidavits of the claimant that the property attached and the deposit made in lieu thereof belonged to him and not to attachment defendant.[94]

2. Liabilities on Bonds

§ 374. Liability of Claimant

Claimant's liability on his bond arises upon a breach of its conditions.

The liability of a claimant on his bond is analogous to that of an attachment defendant on a forthcoming bond, and it arises upon a breach of the conditions of the bond. This liability accrues and is fixed by a final judgment against defendant in the attachment suit,[95] but the bond is not forfeited until execution has been issued on the judgment and claimant has failed to surrender the property to the sheriff according to the condition of the bond,[96] and, where the obligation of the bond is construed to be that defendant will perform the judgment, or the obligors will have the property or its value forthcoming to answer the judgment of the court, until there has been a judgment subjecting the property, and the judgment debtor has failed to satisfy it, there is not a breach.[97]

Even though claimant establishes his title to most of the property and fails as to only a small portion, his liability to deliver that which does not belong to him continues, and the bond should not be quashed.[98]

A condition that claimant will prosecute the action to effect means that he will prosecute it successfully,[99] and a failure to prosecute the action constitutes a breach of the bond.[1] Conditions of the bond that claimant will prosecute his action to effect and that plaintiff shall return the property, if return be adjudged, and in default thereof pay the assessed value are separate conditions, independent covenants, and a failure to perform either constitutes a breach of the bond.[2]

A sale of the property by claimant placing it beyond his power to return it constitutes a breach of a bond conditioned to deliver it on a finding against his claim.[3]

Bankruptcy of defendant. That defendant in attachment was adjudicated a bankrupt and that his receiver claimed the property, or that the receiver subsequently transferred what title he had in the property to claimant, would not affect the liability of the obligors on the claimant's bond, it being conditioned that the claimant would, in an action thereon, prove that he was the general owner of the property at the time of seizure, or pay plaintiff the value thereof.[4]

Destruction of property. Under a bond conditioned to deliver up the property on demand or pay the value of the property, an intervener who secures possession of attached property by giving a bond for its later delivery, if so decreed, is the legal custodian of the property, and has the duty of safely keeping it, and in case the property is destroyed, even though such destruction was not claimant's fault, the injured party may be indemnified from his bond.[5] Under this

Fieri facias

The contention of plaintiff, in a suit on a forthcoming bond given by claimant in attachment, that there was a breach because property was not produced on demand and was dissipated, was unsound, in view of Civ.Code (1910) § 5122, as plaintiff could not make a legal demand or complain of dissipation of property until he was legally in a position to sell it and could not be in such position until he had a fieri facias.—Bowden v. Scott, 99 S.E. 140, 23 Ga.App. 636.

Surrender not bona fide

Liability arises on claimant's forthcoming bond where the surrender of the property to the sheriff is not made in good faith and did not constitute a legal surrender.—Farmers' & Merchants' Bank v. Cochran, 141 S.E. 919, 37 Ga.App. 794.

Claimant wrongdoer

"The claimant in this case has been adjudged to be a wrongdoer—in other words, the court has adjudged his claim to be unfounded, and his litigation to be false. Shall he now be heard to say, 'True, I have detained this horse wrongfully two years, but now he is dead I can't return him, therefore I ask to be exonerated from my covenant to do so, or to pay the judgment rendered'? The terms of the covenant are unconditionally to return the horse or pay his value, or abide the judgment of the court. Shall the law incorporate other terms for the benefit of the wrongdoer? The rules have not been so far extended either at law or in equity; we see no reason to do so; neither justice nor public policy demands this."—Dear v. Brannon, 4 Bush (Ky.) 471, 477.

rule the only excuse for a failure to have the property forthcoming is an act of God, the law, or the conduct of the other party.[6]

Illegal levy. Since an attachment lien does not exist where the levy is illegal and void, where there has been an illegal levy, the attachment plaintiff, having no lien on the property, cannot recover on a claimant's bond for claimant's failure to redeliver the property.[7]

Liability of claimant to sureties. A surety against whom, together with claimant, judgment for damages and costs had been rendered, and who had paid a fieri facias issued thereon, was entitled, under early statutes of Georgia, to control the fieri facias for the purpose of reimbursing himself out of the effects of claimant.[8]

§ 375. Liability of Sureties

The sureties are liable on the bond after liability has accrued against the principal because of a breach of its conditions.

The liability of the sureties on a claimant's bond does not become fixed or enforceable until a liability on the part of his principal has accrued.[9] A liability on the part of the sureties is, however, created, and a proceeding against them authorized, on a failure of claimant to deliver the property in accordance with a condition of the bond,[10] or the dismissal of the claim because of a failure to comply with the statutory procedure.[11]

Such an undertaking fixes an unconditional obligation on the surety to pay the judgment, regardless of any defects or irregularities in the issuance or levying of the attachment,[12] and regardless of the failure to observe the formalities of statutory provisions relating to bonds or undertakings furnished;[13] but such is not the case where the attachment proceedings were void for want of jurisdiction, since under such circumstances the bond is not supported by a consideration.[14]

Destruction of property. In accordance with the rules discussed in the previous section with regard

Intervener distinguished from officer

An intervener securing attached property upon giving bond is not in the same position as a levying officer who holds attached property for a particular purpose. If the property is lost or damaged in the possession of the latter while he is exercising reasonable care, no liability attaches to him, such is not the case of the intervener who is not a mere bailee of his alleged own property.—Doggett, Bassett & Hills Co. v Black, (C.C Ind) 40 F. 489.

After removal from state

An objection in a proceeding on a forthcoming bond that the attachment on partnership property was issued against one partner alone was not available after the property had been delivered on faith of a bond and had been removed from the state—U S. Common-law liability

Although a bond given to regain possession of personalty taken under warrant of seizure fails to comply with statutory requirements, the surety may be held bound as on a common-law obligation to the covenant to which he subscribed—Pacific Finance Corporation v. Fidelity & Deposit Co of Maryland, 272 N Y. S. 513, 151 Misc. 798.

Failure to endorse writ

The surety on a replevin bond could not escape liability thereunder because the replevin writ was not indorsed where plaintiff in replevin who was the principal under bond took possession of the property—Spickard v Continental Casualty Co, (Mo App) 64 S.W (2d) 734

14. Sloan v. Young, 284 P. 131, 86 Mont. 414.

to claimant's liability on the bond, according to some authority the surety is liable on the bond in case of the destruction of the property as it cannot be delivered on demand even though claimant was not the cause of such destruction or otherwise at fault, the only excuses available to the surety being acts of God, the law, or the conduct of the other party,[15] according to other authority, however, the sureties on claimant's release bond are entitled to show that it is impossible to return the property because of its destruction by death or otherwise, if such destruction was without the fault or negligence of claimant, since it is the duty of the sureties to redeliver the property, and, if that is impossible, it operates as a discharge from the obligation[16]

§ 376. Discharge of Sureties

The surety on the bond is, as a rule, discharged only by the extinguishment of the obligation of the principal or a performance of the conditions of the bond.

While the general rule, as discussed in the title Principal and Surety § 116 [50 C J. p 93 note 29], is that the liability of a surety ends with the extinguishment of the obligation of the principal, and while this rule undoubtedly applies to the discharge of sureties on a claimant's bond given in an attachment proceeding, it has been held that the sureties on a claimant's bond will not be discharged by the neglect of the claimant to take advantage of the failure of attachment plaintiff to make up the issue to try the right of property;[17] the destruction of the bond either before or after claimant obtained possession of the property,[18] an adjudication of bankruptcy against defendant in attachment,[19] the fact that claimant's possession of the property was hindered or delayed by the assertion of some right therein by the debtor's receiver in bankruptcy, which was thereafter waived,[20] an agreement between attachment plaintiff and several claimants whereby suits are tried together;[21] an agreement that the verdict and judgment in one of several suits to be actually tried shall be the verdict and judgment in all,[22] or an agreement between attachment plaintiff and claimant that the value of the property at the time of the trial shall be assessed at the sum shown by an inventory taken some time before;[23] nor will a payment by the sureties on one of claimant's bonds of a judgment for a greater amount than the value of the property release them from their obligation on a bond given to a subsequently attaching creditor of the same property,[24] nor can the sureties be released from liability on application therefor by representing that claimant is about to leave the country and permit an issue framed to go by default.[25] Since the operation of the intervener's bond may be distinguished from the operation of a supersedeas bond, the execution of a supersedeas bond does not operate to release the surety from liability on the bond to release the attached property.[26] Where a claimant's bond is quashed and another substituted, the sureties on the latter cannot escape liability because the bond was executed after delivery of the property,[27] nor is a surety released by an amendment to the complaint unless such amendment states a cause of action different from that on which the bond was given.[28]

§ 377. Enforcement of Liability

Under the various provisions of the statutes, liability on the bond may be enforced by rule or motion or action on the bond.

The enforcement of liability on the bond depends on the procedure provided by statute. Under various statutes, the liability on the claimant's bond may be enforced by rule or motion,[29] by entering judgment against claimant and his sureties in the proceeding to try the right of property, where claimant is unsuccessful therein, as already pointed out in § 363c, or by an action on the bond.[30] Under some statutes a sheriff or constable can summarily declare a statutory bond forfeited upon breach of its conditions, but where the bond is not so conditioned as to constitute a statutory bond, such summary procedure cannot be had, and the obligation of the bond can be enforced only by the common-law remedies.[31]

§ 378. —— Nature and Form of Remedy

In the absence of a statute to the contrary the nature and form of the remedy is the same as that of actions on bonds generally, as discussed in the title Bonds § 105 [9 C.J. p 82 note 1–p 84 note 28]. For future cases, if any, on this point peculiar to actions of this nature, consult Pocket Parts under this section number.

§ 379. —— Right of Action

The right of action on the bond given by a claimant of attached property is the same as that on other bonds, as discussed in the title Bonds § 99 [9 C.J. p 78 note 43–p 82 note 99].

§ 380. —— Conditions Precedent

The only conditions precedent to a suit on the bond are that the attachment be sustained and that there be a breach of a condition of the bond.

Ordinarily the only conditions precedent to liability on the bond are that the attachment is sustained and that a breach of a condition of the bond occurs.[32] In the absence of a statute to the contrary an order of sale of the attached property need not be entered, particularly where such an order would be futile in view of a removal of the property out of the court's jurisdiction[33] Where the principal has departed from the jurisdiction, notice to him of a motion to require the obligors on the bond to produce the property is not a prerequisite to liability of sureties who have been properly served with such notice.[34] In so far as liability on claimant's bond is concerned, a failure of the sheriff to levy execution on property, which is already subject to an attachment lien in his hands, is immaterial.[35]

§ 381. —— Defenses

Payment of the judgment or a lack of consideration for the bond is an effective defense to an action on the bond.

Payment to the attaching plaintiff of the indebtedness due him is a sufficient defense to an action on the claim bond,[36] and it has also been held that defendants may avail themselves of the fact that the officer accepting the bond had no authority to do so[37] Want of consideration is also a good defense to an action on the bond[38]

On the other hand, it cannot be set up as a defense that claimant is the real owner of the property attached,[39] that the property was not liable to attachment,[40] that claimant did not actually obtain possession of the property,[41] that the bond was executed after delivery of the property[42] or by mistake,[43] or that claimant did not sign the bond;[44] nor can defendants assign errors in the attachment proceedings between the creditor and his debtor,[45] or set up that the officer bringing the action, to whom the bond was given, has no interest in the property,[46] or any irregularity in the bond, after delivery had been made thereunder.[47]

§ 382. —— Jurisdiction and Venue

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, jurisdiction is governed by the general rules of jurisdiction in civil actions as discussed in the title Courts § 15 et seq [15 C J. p 723 note 78 et seq], and the venue is governed by the rules discussed in the title Venue For future cases, if any such may arise, not falling within such general rules, consult Pocket Parts under this title and section number.

§ 383. —— Time to Sue and Limitations

The conditions in the bond determine the time at which a right of action thereon accrues.

The time at which a right of action on a claimant's bond accrues depends upon the nature and condition of the bond. If it is conditioned for the delivery of the property, or its value, to satisfy any judgment obtained against defendant in attachment within a certain time thereafter, an action on the bond lies at the expiration of such time, although the intervention has not been disposed of, and the judgment against defendant did not order condemnation of the attached property.[48] If, however, the bond is conditioned to satisfy only such judgment as may be rendered against claimant himself, no action lies until after rendition of such a judgment.[49] Under a statute authorizing a claimant to the property attached to give a bond conditioned that, in an action thereon to be commenced within three months, the claimant will establish that he was the general owner of the property at the time of the seizure, or, if he fails so to do, that he will pay to plaintiff the value thereof, an action on a claimant's bond must be brought by plaintiff in the attachment within the time specified[50]

§ 384. —— Parties, Process, and Appearance

Either the plaintiff in attachment or the attaching officer who is obligee of the bond is a proper party plaintiff, and the surety may be sued alone.

Where the bond is payable to plaintiff, his right to maintain an action thereon is clear.[51] Where the bond is payable to the attaching officer, he is a proper party plaintiff,[52] and, under some statutes, it is held that, inasmuch as plaintiff is the real party in interest, an action on the bond may be maintained in his name, although it is payable to the attaching officer.[53]

The surety may be sued alone,[54] particularly where claimant did not sign the bond.[55]

§ 385. —— Pleading

a. In general
b. Issues and proof

a. In General

To be sufficient, a pleading must state a cause of action or raise a defense thereto, as the case may be.

In an action on a claimant's bond, as in other civil actions, plaintiff's pleadings must state a cause of action. If plaintiff proceeds by a common-law action on the bond, it is only necessary to set out the execution of the bond,[56] and a breach of its conditions,[57] and, inasmuch as the parties are bound to notice the determination of the claim suit, no averment of notice to them of determination is necessary[58] Where the application for leave to bring action on claimant's bond must be made to the court before the warrant of attachment is vacated or annulled, in an action on the bond it is not necessary for plaintiff to allege that the order giving him leave to sue was properly issued[59] A complaint alleging the death of the person giving the bond and the naming of attachment defendant as executor, which allegation was not denied by the answer, has been held sufficient to warrant a judgment against defendant as executor, where the court found that he, and not claimant, was the owner of the property.[60]

A motion for judgment on a claimant's bond, under some statutes, may, it has been held, be heard and determined either upon or without written pleadings.[61]

Where a claim to the attached property is interposed, a reply by plaintiff in attachment consisting of only a general denial of the claim of ownership made by claimant is insufficient to bring plaintiff within a statute which provides that plaintiff in attachment shall, as against third persons, be deemed a purchaser in good faith and for value.[62]

b. Issues and Proof

The only issue is whether there has been a breach of the conditions in the bond, and proof may be made of anything within the issues.

Ordinarily the only issue is whether there has been a breach of the conditions in the bond.[63] For example, in an action on a claimant's bond conditioned that in an action thereon, to be commenced within a certain time, he will establish that he is the owner of the property, or, failing therein, will pay to plaintiff the value thereof, the sole issue is as to the ownership of such property.[64]

In accordance with the general rules of proof in civil cases, proof may be made of any matter within the issues. Accordingly, where the issue is whether claimant shall be liable on his bond for the entire value of the property or to the extent of the creditor's claim, he may prove that he has a right to the property seized as between himself and the owner, so as to limit his liability to the amount of the attaching creditor's claim.[65]

§ 386. —— Evidence in General

In actions of this character the party having the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proving it.

As in other civil actions, in an action on a claimant's bond the burden of proof rests on the party having the affirmative of an issue. Accordingly, in an action on a bond conditioned that claimant will establish that he is the owner of the property or will pay the value thereof, the burden of proof as to ownership is on defendant.[66]

Where the complaint alleged that defendant gave plaintiff a bond conditioned "to pay the value of the property . . . to wit," a certain sum, and the allegation was not denied, it was not necessary for plaintiff to offer any proof on the subject.[67]

§ 387. —— Admissibility of Evidence

The principles determining the admissibility of evidence in actions on bonds given by third persons claiming attached property have been those applicable to civil actions generally and have been discussed in the title Evidence. For future cases, if any, arising under the statutes presenting rules not falling within the general rules, consult Pocket Parts under this section number.

§ 388. —— Weight and Sufficiency of Evidence

The party having the burden of proving an issue must sustain it by a preponderance of evidence.

The party having the burden of proving an issue in an action on a claimant's bond must prove it by a preponderance of the evidence, and if the proof on the issue is evenly balanced, he is not entitled to recover thereon.[68] The judgment recovered in the main action is no evidence of the value of the property in an action on the claimant's bond, and such value must be established independently of the judgment.[69] A recital in a forthcoming bond that the principal obligor claims the property is not evidence that a claim has actually been made, but only that the obligor intended to make it.[70] Where a claim was dismissed for failure to file the required affidavit, mere proof by plaintiff, in an action on the claimant's bond, that the property was not forthcoming is insufficient to show a breach of the condition, it being necessary to show that claimant was not entitled to the property.[71] Evidence showing refusal of claimant to deliver the property after the failure of his claim is sufficient to fix his liability,[72] and a return of nulla bona on an execution against attachment defendant is sufficient to render sureties on the bond liable.[73] Where under the statute the sheriff must evaluate the property, a valuation by him that it was more than plaintiff's claim presumptively entitled plaintiff to judgment without other proof of value.[74]

§ 389. —— Trial

Questions of fact should, where there is a jury trial, be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court.

In keeping with the general rules governing civil actions, in an action on claimant's bond, questions of law are for the court to decide, while questions of fact are for the jury. Accordingly, where the evidence is conflicting, the court should not direct the verdict, but should submit the issue to the jury under proper instructions.[75] Where all the testimony in an action on a replevin bond by one claiming the property under attachment related to the question of title to the property at the time when the attachment was levied, an instruction that the burden of proof was on defendants to show title to the property replevied, etc., was not objectionable on the ground that it should have limited the inquiry as to defendants' title to the time when the attachment was levied.[76]

§ 390. —— Judgment

Judgment may be entered for the amount of the debt where it is less than the value of the property.

Although, as will be discussed in § 392, the damages recoverable in an action on claimant's bond are limited to the value of the property, it has been held to be immaterial that the judgment was for the amount of the debt instead of for the value of the property, where the debt was less than such value.[77] Where under the bond claimant has the right to return the property to the sheriff to abide the decree of the court or become liable for its value, the rendering of a decree on the bond for its penalty without a finding as to the value of the property is error.[78]

The judgment for plaintiff, in a suit on defendant's replevy bond, should provide for its satisfaction by a return of the property attached, unless it is manifest from the wording of the bond that the intention was to substitute personal liability of the sureties; and a surety on the bond may insist on the right to return the property if the principal joins in the demand. A tender of the property replevied from an attachment levied by the sheriff must be made to the sheriff, a tender to plaintiff in attachment not being sufficient.[79]

§ 391. —— Appeal and Error

General rules as to appeals and proceedings in error apply.

Ordinarily, appeals in actions of this character are governed by the usual rules as to appeal and proceedings in error in civil cases generally, as discussed in the title Appeal and Error. Accordingly, the appellate court will interpret the evidence in the most favorable light, in support of the judgment rendered by the trial court and the findings of fact either made by it or necessarily implied to support the judgment.[80] Likewise, the amount of recovery will not be reviewed where the motion for new trial did not assign that the judgment was excessive.[81]

§ 392. —— Damages

The liability on a claimant's bond is limited by the terms of the bond and the value of the attached property released thereunder.

Liability on the bond must, of course, be measured by the terms of the bond,[82] and the recovery thereon cannot exceed the amount named therein,[83] and is also, as a rule, limited to the value of the property delivered to claimant, with interest[84] and costs.[85] Likewise, where the value of the property taken exceeds the amount of the creditor's claim, the damages should be limited to the amount of the claim,[86] except where the sheriff had taken the property from the owner and is responsible over to the owner for the excess in value of the property above the amount due the creditor, in which case recovery for the full value of the property is proper.[87] The foregoing is true regardless of the amount of the judgment recovered in the attachment suit,[88] or of the fact that there are several attaching creditors.[89]

In regard to the items for which recovery may be had, it has been held that plaintiff may recover damages for the loss of the use of such property during the time it was in the intervener's possession,[90] and for deterioration in the value of the property while in claimant's possession.[91] Where personal property and money were attached and where the property was released to claimant on his giving bond, but

where the money was not discharged from the attachment, in an action against the sureties on claimant's bond, the sureties are entitled to have the amount of money so attached applied in reduction of damages against them.[92] Where attachment plaintiff intermeddled with the property released on claimant's bond so as to divert a portion of it from the control of the sureties, the sureties, in an action against them, are entitled to credit on the bond for the amount diverted.[93] A sum which claimant has paid to the attachment debtor in lieu of the latter's exemption cannot be considered in fixing the amount of the liability on his bond.[94]

Nominal damages. Where there has been a breach of the conditions of the bond, plaintiff is entitled to recover nominal damages, although no actual damages are proved.[95]

C. RECOVERY OF DAMAGES FOR DISPOSSESSION

§ 393. Right to Recover

One who owns, or who is entitled to possession of, property which is attached in an action against another may recover damages sustained by his dispossession.

Since, as already pointed out in § 339, the right to intervene is merely a cumulative and not an exclusive remedy, where an attachment is levied on property of which a person other than defendant in attachment is the owner or entitled to possession, such person has a right of action for the damages which he has sustained by reason of the resulting dispossession,[96] whether or not he had previously intervened in the action.[97] This right is not affected by the fact that the property was in the possession of defendant in attachment at the time of the seizure,[98] that the owner of the property came into possession under a fraudulent sale, such sale not being connected with the grounds of attachment,[99] that the owner of the goods which were mixed with those of defendant in attachment refused to designate his share;[1] that the property was sold subsequent to the wrongful seizure thereof;[2] that plaintiff accepted the proceeds of the property when sold,[3] that there has been a rendition of judgment in the attachment suit,[4] that the owner intervened as claimant in the attachment suit and recovered judgment in the intervention,[5] that there was a rendition of judgment in the claim suit adverse to claimant;[6] or that attachment plaintiff, by amendment of his petition, has brought the owner into the attachment suit as a party.[7]

A lessee whose rights were not disturbed by the attachment,[8] or the holder of a laborer's lien on the property,[9] has been held to have no right to damages

Reversed on appeal

for wrongful seizure and conversion. On the other hand, it has been held that a mortgagee having possession of specific mortgaged property, which was taken under an attachment against another, had a right of action for interference with his possession [10]

Malice and want of probable cause in issuing and levying the writ are not necessary elements in an action of this character, at least where the owner is in possession of the property and there was nothing about it which indicated ownership in attachment defendant.[11]

Notice of contemplated sale. A person whose property has been attached as that of another is under no legal duty to inform attachment plaintiff that he had contracted for the sale of the attached property, particularly where plaintiff knew that he had sold, or was preparing to sell, the property.[12]

§ 394. Persons Liable

Any person responsible for an attachment invading the rights of a third person is liable in damages therefor.

In general, one who is injured by a wrongful attachment may claim entire compensation from any one of several tort-feasors participating in the wrongful act, and one who is injured by reason of a wrongful attachment has the election to pursue jointly or severally all who aided in, or advised or procured, or accepted benefits resulting from, the trespass,[13] including anyone who was present and assisted in the illegal act.[14]

§ 395. —— Levying Officer

The levying officer is always liable for his own wrongful act in seizing, under any process, the property of a person other than the one against whom the process is directed. This general liability, which is the same in the case of attachment as in the case of any other process, is discussed in the title Sheriffs and Constables § 68 [57 C.J. p 827 note 67–p 833 note 42].

§ 396. —— Attaching Creditor

An attaching creditor is generally not liable for the seizure of another's than the debtor's property, unless he directed or consented thereto, or, with knowledge of the wrong, ratified it.

While an attaching creditor may be held liable, jointly with the levying officer[15] and independently of any bond,[16] for a wrongful seizure, under the

Suit not timely

Under a statute providing that a laborer holding a lien on property shall have six months within which to bring suit to foreclose the lien, a holder of a laborer's lien cannot maintain conversion against an attachment creditor on the theory that, on conversion caused by the attachment, the six months' limitation did not apply but that the general two-year period was applicable, at least where the alleged conversion did not take place until more than six months after the filing of the laborer's lien—Higginbotham-Bailey-Logan Co v. "We feel that the question of malice and probable cause are wholly foreign to this case and they can only be considered when, through the very nature of the proceedings, it is necessary to inquire into the motives of persons who cause a writ to be issued or a proceeding to be instituted Where one is in possession and enjoyment of his property and another intermeddles with it, why should it be necessary for him to show that the intermeddler was actuated by malice and had no reason to thus intermeddle with his goods? Why should the facts in this case be treated any differently than an ordinary trespass case where a person willfully enters the land of another and commits a depredation thereon? Malice and probable cause need not be shown to support a recovery in an action of trespass. It must be remembered, that the articles in question were not in the possession of the defendant in the attachment, they were not intermingled with his goods, there was nothing about them which indicated any apparent ownership in him, and where goods are so situated a different question would arise. When property is in ownership and possession of a third person, this condition gives notice to the sheriff and to those dealing with him that in seizing the goods as the property of another they act at their peril The owner has done everything that he could to label the goods with the badge of ownership The sheriff and those acting with him cannot protect themselves under a writ which gives them no authority to act in the premises"—Siegel v Netherlands Co, 59 Pa Super 132, 138.

attachment, of property of a person other than defendant in attachment,[17] such liability is confined to cases in which he counseled, directed, or consented to the illegal act of the levying officer,[18] or actively participated therein,[19] or, knowing that the acts of the officer were wrongful or irregular, adopted, ratified, or confirmed them,[20] and for a wrongful seizure with which the attaching creditor was not so connected he cannot be held liable,[21] but the injured person must seek his redress solely against the levying officer and the sureties on his bond. In accordance with this rule, it has been held that one who would avoid responsibility for a levy on property of a third person, when knowledge of the wrongful act is brought to his attention, should make known his disapprobation thereof; otherwise he will be held to have ratified it.[22] The mere appropriation of the proceeds of the sale of the property by plaintiff in attachment, when turned over to him by the officer levying the writ, in the absence of evidence showing a knowledge on his part of the tortious character of the seizure and sale of the property by such officer, is not sufficient to show ratification of the officer's wrongful act,[23] although, if plaintiff, with knowledge of the true ownership of the goods, receives the proceeds of the sale, he thereby ratifies the wrongful levy.[24]

§ 397. —— Sureties on Attachment Bond

Sureties on an attachment bond conditioned to pay all damages sustained by defendant are not liable to third persons whose property has been seized under the writ, but, under a bond conditioned in terms broad enough to include such persons, they may be liable to third persons in actions of this character.

Since the liability of sureties on an attachment bond is created by, and rests solely on, the stipulations of the bond,[25] the sureties on an attachment bond, conditioned to pay all damages which may be sustained by defendant, cannot ordinarily be held liable for a trespass committed to the property of a third person,[26] even though their principal ratified

Levy on partnership's goods for debt of individual

Where an attachment in an action against an individual is levied on the property of a partnership of which he is a member, there is no liability on the bond for such wrongful at-the tort of the attaching officer.[27] Although it has been held that the sureties are not liable to a third person, whose property has been wrongfully attached, under a bond conditioned to pay all damages sustained by any person by reason of the suing out of the attachment,[28] it has also been held that the sureties are liable to such third persons under a bond so conditioned,[29] and where the statute requires a bond running in favor of others who may be injured by the attachment, this provision, although omitted, will be read into the bond, so that a stranger thereto, injured by the attachment, may maintain an action thereon.[30] In support of the rule permitting recovery against the sureties on such a bond, it has been said that to construe the words "suing out of said attachment" to relate only to the initial proceedings, the filing, docketing, and issue of the papers, so that only those then interested could have recourse against the bond, would give no meaning to the words "other persons interested in these proceedings," as there is no one except plaintiff interested in an attachment until there has been a levy or seizure of property under it.[31]

The liability of the obligors on an indemnity bond, given to secure the sheriff against loss arising from the claims of third persons, is discussed in the title Sheriffs and Constables §§ 137–143 [57 C J. p 926 note 27–p 932 note 95].

§ 398. Actions

A demand is not in all cases a condition precedent to an action.

Where plaintiff in attachment caused a writ of attachment to issue and be put in the hands of the sheriff, who seized property not in the possession of defendant in attachment and sold it on execution, and where plaintiff in attachment bid in the property at the sale and retained it, a conversion of the property took place, and a demand for a return of the property is unnecessary.[32]

§ 399. —— Nature and Form of Remedy

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the common-law remedies may be availed of.

A person whose property has been attached in a suit to which he is not a party may resort to the common-law remedies for the damages inflicted by the seizure,[33] and, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, such a person may disregard the attachment bond and sue in tort.[34] Accordingly, trespass[35] or trover,[36] if there has been a taking of actual possession,[37] is a proper form of action to recover damages for the wrongful seizure of one's property under a writ of attachment directed against another.

Actions of this character are not actions for distraining a chattel.[38]

§ 400. —— Defenses

Matters which defeat plaintiff's right to recover constitute a defense in actions of this character.

As in other civil actions, any fact or state of facts that may be set up to defeat the cause of action constitutes a defense. Accordingly, the absence of injury may be set up as a defense.[39] It also is a defense to an attaching creditor that plaintiff's claim is invalid and rests on a fraudulent transfer of the property by the debtor,[40] unless the vacating of the attachment has precluded defendant from justifying under it,[41] or attachment defendant pleads in recoupment and recovers therefor, in which case attachment plaintiff cannot, in an action by a third person for wrongful attachment, plead in justification that a sale to plaintiff was in fraud of creditors.[42] On the other hand, the fact that defendant had reason to believe that the property belonged to his debtor instead of to plaintiff is not a defense to an action to recover the value of the property,[43] nor is it a defense that plaintiff might have given a claim bond and have had a trial of the right of property in the goods attached, since plaintiff had a right to allow the property to be carried away, and, if the levy were wrongful, to bring an action for damages.[44] Also, it is not a defense that the petition of intervention was not filed until after the final judgment in the attachment suit.[45] In trover for levying an attachment against a husband on property of the wife, it is no defense that the husband authorized the levy.[46] Where several creditors seized property by attachment, one of such creditors may be sued for the attachment, and he cannot defend by setting up that the other creditors were also liable for the trespass.[47]

Where punitive damages are sought, defendant may set up in defense that a judgment finding for plaintiff in a claim case arising from the attachment was erroneous, such judgment being conclusive in so far as title is concerned but not on the question of malice or lack of probable cause.[48]

§ 401. —— Parties

Plaintiff may sue one or all persons jointly and severally liable to him.

The attaching creditor and the levying officer being both jointly and severally liable for the wrongful seizure, it is not necessary to join the officer as a party defendant in an action against the creditor.[49] So, also, where there were several attaching creditors, the owner of the property seized may sue one without joining the others,[50] or he may sue all.[51]

§ 402. —— Pleading

a. Complaint, declaration, or petition
b Plea or answer
c. Issues, proof, and variance

a. Complaint, Declaration, or Petition

It is usually sufficient for plaintiff to state in his initial pleadings that the property attached as that of another was his, that the attachment was wrongful, and that damage resulted to him therefrom.

As in other civil actions, plaintiff's complaint, declaration, or petition to be sufficient must contain facts upon which he relies sufficient to state a cause of action. To do this he usually need allege only that the property seized was his, that the attachment was wrongful, and that damage resulted to him therefrom. In general, the complaint, declaration, or petition in an action for the seizure of property under an attachment against another person need allege only that the attachment was wrongful, and the resulting damage.[52]

Plaintiff already compensated

Where parties furnishing personalty for plaintiff's use had compensated plaintiff for damages sustained by delay caused by attachments, as they were required to do under contract, plaintiff could not recover for alleged wrongful attachments.—Riggle v Jackson, 296 P. 889, 112 Cal App. 428

Redelivery of goods

In an action by an administrator to recover the value of goods belonging to the estate, which were levied on by defendants as the property of another, an answer that, on the demand and bond of the special administrator, the goods were delivered to him, that the estate received the goods uninjured, that they were sold under orders of the probate court, and that the estate got the benefit of the proceeds, states a good defense.—Pinkard v. Willis, 67 S.W. 135, 28 Tex Civ App 198

52. Gustafson v. Byers, 288 P 111, 105 Cal.App 584—6 C.J. p 418 note 30.

Petitions held sufficient.—Gustaf-

It is sufficient to state that the seizure was wrongful,[53] without specifying the manner in which it was made[54] or stating the time of the levy,[55] or the value of the property.[56]

It is not necessary to allege that the attachment was malicious and without probable cause, nor need malice in the seizure of plaintiff's property be alleged if only actual damages are sought to be recovered.[57]

Special damages must be pleaded in order to be recoverable.[58]

b. Plea or Answer

The plea or answer to be sufficient must raise the defense relied upon by defendant

In accordance with the rules governing civil actions generally, the plea or answer to be sufficient must be sufficient to raise an issue as to any defense available. Accordingly, where such a defense is relied upon defendant must aver the existence of a debt due to him from defendant in attachment[59] and that the property was, at the time of the seizure, that of defendant in attachment,[60] and deny that such property was that of plaintiff,[61] and that defendant had notice of plaintiff's claim of ownership.[62] A defendant who was plaintiff in attachment need not, when justifying, aver the ground on which the attachment was issued, or set out the return of the writ.[63]

A general denial is usually sufficient to admit any evidence that plaintiff never had a cause of action either as to all of the property involved, or as to any part thereof; but it is not sufficient to raise a special defense.[64]

c. Issues, Proof, and Variance

The issues are confined to those raised by the pleadings, and the proof is confined to matters arising under the issues.

As in other civil actions, the issues in an action of this character are confined to those raised by the pleadings, which are the existence of the cause of action and defenses thereto. Other matters are not in issue. Accordingly, the existence or nonexistence of grounds for the issuance of a writ of attachment,[65] or probable cause for suing out the writ,[66] or of malice in connection therewith,[67] is entirely foreign to the question of liability for seizure and conversion, under the guise of an attachment, of property of a person other than the attachment defendant. So also a judgment sustaining the attachment has no bearing on the question whether the levy was wrongful as to a third person.[68]

Plaintiff may ordinarily show that defendant knew of his claim to the property,[69] and, where the good faith of such claim is attacked, that the claim was bona fide.[70] Plaintiff may also introduce evidence showing the damages sustained by him because of the wrongful levy on his property,[71] and the cost price of the property, while not conclusive as to its value at the time of the seizure, may be shown to aid in arriving at the value at such time.[72] On the other hand, where special damages are not pleaded, the admission of evidence to establish special damages is error.[73]

Under the general issue defendant may show that the goods did not belong to plaintiff but belonged to attachment defendant,[74] and, under proper allegations, he may show fraud affecting himself,[75] if such fraud involves plaintiff,[76] or that it was not his intention to make an excessive levy,[77] or that no damage was sustained by plaintiff by virtue of the levy;[78] but no evidence relating to the merits of the attachment suit,[79] or as to the regularity of the proceedings therein,[80] is admissible.

In mitigation of damages defendant may show that the property wrongfully attached has been returned, or has been applied for the benefit or advantage of plaintiff with his consent, express or implied, or through legal proceedings instituted by third persons,[81] or that the owner of the attached property recovered it for less than its value.[82]

§ 403. —— Evidence

a. In general
b. Admissibility
c. Weight and sufficiency

a. In General

A party having the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proving it.

As in other civil actions, the party having the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proving it.[83] In the absence of a judicial determination of plaintiff's ownership in the attachment proceedings,[84] ordinarily plaintiff has the burden of establishing his ownership,[85] particularly where the attachment defendant was in possession of the property at the time of the levy,[86] although the placing on defendant of the burden of showing that the attachment defendant had some interest in the property has been held not to be error.[87] Likewise, plaintiff has the burden of proving injury to himself as a result of the wrongful levy on his property.[88]

In proceedings against an attaching creditor who justifies under the writ he must prove a debt from the attachment defendant to him,[89] and where he attempts to justify his action on the ground that a transfer of the property from the attachment defendant to plaintiff was fraudulent, he has the burden of proving fraud.[90]

Presumption from failure to call debtor. The failure of the attaching creditor, after having testified to the bona fides of his claim and the consideration paid therefor, to introduce the debtors who are present in court as witnesses is not a suspicious circumstance against the validity of the transaction, and does not authorize any presumption against him.[91]

Evidence of lack of damage

In an action for alleged wrongful attachment of personalty furnished by others for plaintiff's use in drilling oil well, evidence of a contract whereby others agreed to pay plaintiff damages in case of delay is competent on the theory that there can be no recovery for a wrongful attachment where no damages have been sustained thereby—Riggle v Jackson, 296 P 889, 112 Cal App. 428

b. Admissibility

The general rules as to the admissibility of evidence apply.

The general rules as to the admissibility of evidence in civil cases apply to actions brought for the recovery of damages for dispossession of property attached as that of another.[92] Hearsay and irrelevant evidence will be excluded.[93] Testimony of a person familiar with the type of property seized under the writ is admissible to show the decline in value of the property while it was wrongfully withheld from plaintiff.[94] The finding of the jury in the claim suit cannot be given in evidence for the purpose of increasing the damages.[95]

c. Weight and Sufficiency

The party having the affirmative of an issue must prove it by a preponderance of the evidence

The party having the burden of proving an issue must establish it by a preponderance of the evidence, and a preponderance is sufficient.[96] Where the property taken is claimed by an assignee of defendant in attachment, and his allegation in the pleadings as to the value of the property is not controverted, the sheriff's return showing the value is sufficient proof of the same.[97] Proof that defendant gave the levying officer an indemnifying bond at the time of the attachment presumptively establishes his liability for the wrongful seizure by the officer.[98] On the question of the value of the property, the price which the goods brought at a forced sale is not conclusive.[99]

Where property is seized in an attachment suit pending between other parties, and a demand is made for the property and it is refused, there is prima facie evidence of a conversion,[1] and undisputed evidence of possession at the time of attachment makes a prima facie case of ownership.[2]

While a sheriff's return is prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein,[3] his return to the attachment is not conclusive as to the identity of the property attached, and plaintiff may show aliunde that the property attached was the same as that described in a mortgage on which his claim is based.[4]

Where punitive or exemplary damages are sought, under some statutes the existence of malice must be established by evidence direct or circumstantial.[5] The absence of malice is conclusively proved by evidence that plaintiff acted under

§ 404. —— Trial

General rules apply to trials in actions of this character.

In accordance with the rules governing the trial of civil actions generally, the instructions must correctly advise the jury as to the law applicable to the questions before them,[7] and be consistent with the evidence[8] and pleadings,[9] and so phrased as not to be conflicting[10] or tend to mislead the jury.[11]

As in other civil actions, questions of fact,[12] including the weight to be given to particular testimony,[13] are for the determination of the jury, or by the court, sitting as a jury,[14] but where the evidence is uncontradicted, there is nothing for the jury to decide [15]

The verdict must be in accord with the weight of evidence,[16] and must not be excessive [17]

Place of trial. Under a statute providing that an action must be tried in the county where the cause of action arose if it is to recover a chattel distrained, or damages for distraining, an action for damages for dispossession of chattels attached as property of another is not an action for distraining a chattel, and need not be tried in the county where the cause of action arose.[18]

§ 405. —— Damages

Where plaintiff is entitled to recover, his damages should be for the amount of injury actually resulting to him, unless the case is such that an award of punitive damages is proper.

Where plaintiff does not ask for exemplary or punitive damages, upon a proper showing he is entitled to recover all actual damages resulting from the wrongful seizure,[19] but under such circumstances he is entitled to recover only his actual damages[20] He is not entitled to recover for expenses which he otherwise would have incurred if his property had not been seized,[21] or for damages which are not the proximate result of the attachment.[22]

While no fixed rule of damages can be declared which will apply in every instance, as the measure of damages must of necessity vary in different cases according to the facts,[23] as a general rule where plaintiff was totally deprived of his property the measure of damages is the market[24] value of the property taken[25] at the time of seizure,[26] with interest,[27] or, if interest would not be a just standard, the value of the use of the property,[28] from the date of the levy up to the time of trial. Where there is a rise in the value of the property seized after the levy, it has also been held that plaintiff is entitled to recover for a conversion the highest intermediate value between the time of the levy and the time of the trial.[29] Where the property was only detained for a time, the measure of damages is the value of the use during such time,[30]

Payment under duress

General damages

In an action for damages in trespass for wrongful levy of an attachment, only general damages may be recovered if the petition fails to plead special damages—First Nat Bank of Mounds v. Cox, 198 P. 579, 82 Okl 129.

20. No disturbance of possession

The mere wrongful levy of an attachment writ on oil drilling equipment does not give rise to damages in conversion, in the absence of a disturbance of the possession and actual loss proximately resulting therefrom—Schulte v. Republic Supply Co, (Tex Civ App) 297 S W 667

Real property

In the absence of a pending sale, the mere levy of a writ of attachment upon real property, which does not disturb the possession or use of the property by the owner, affords no grounds for recovery of other than nominal damages—Keystone Pipe & Supply Co v. Crabtree, (Okl) 50 P (2d) 1086.

Cost of feeding stock

In an action for damages for the wrongful attachment of personal property, where plaintiff owner of the property was not deprived of its use and possession, he having given a bond for its retention, he only bore the cost of maintenance of the live stock attached as he would have done had there been no attachment, and, consequently, he is not entitled to recover the cost of feeding them while holding them under his retention bond—Crawford v. Staples, 212 S W 119, 187 Ky 477.

Cost of harvesting

Where, in an action by the owner of attached wheat for damages from the sale thereof pending the litigation, the evidence showed that plaintiff acquiesced in such sale and payment of expenses, and there was no evidence of any unreasonable expense connected therewith, defendants were liable only for the net amount received for the wheat and costs of suit, and plaintiff could not recover the costs of harvesting—Tuttle v Bell, 142 P 940, 92 Kan 725, rehearing denied 144 P. 217, 93 Kan 234

Death of live stock

Plaintiff suffered no loss of profit from failure to consummate a sale upon a purchase offer made while the attachment was pending, which loss was the proximate result of the attachment, where he still retained property equivalent in value to the price offered, and his only loss was to horses from disease and mules from increased age, both of which were natural causes not resulting from the attachment—Crawford v Staples, 212 S W. 119, 184 Ky 477.

Inability to accept offer of sale

In an action for wrongful attachment of plaintiff's live stock, a claimed loss from being prevented by the attachment from accepting an offer of sale was held to be too remote, improbable, and speculative to justify damages, at least until notice of the possibility of the sale was brought to the parties securing the attachment—Crawford v Staples, 212 S.W. 119, 184 Ky. 477.

Loss due to decline in market value

A loss due to the decline in the market value of goods held under a wrongful attachment was held to be a natural and proximate cause of the wrongful attachment—Rosenberg v Stone, 168 S E. 436, 160 Va. 381.

or the difference between the value of the property at the time of seizure and its value when released from the levy.[31]

Recovery may also be had, in a proper case, for expenses incident to the wrongful levy,[32] including necessary expenses incurred in a suit to recover possession,[33] such as counsel fees,[34] stenographic expenses,[35] and traveling expenses;[36] but injury to credit,[37] and a decrease in business,[38] have been held to be too remote to be recovered in an action of this character.

Where plaintiff had only a partial interest in the property the damages recoverable must be measured by the extent of his interest,[39] and if the attachment is wrongful in part, plaintiff can recover damages for the seizure of property in excess of that which the real debt justified[40]

Duty to minimize damages. As in other civil actions, a person, whose property has been attached under a writ issued against another person, is under a duty to take reasonable steps to reduce his loss caused thereby and to minimize his damages,[41] but in view of the rule governing damages generally that the efforts which the injured party must make to avoid the consequences of the wrongful act or omission need only be reasonable under the circumstances of the particular case, as discussed in the title Damages § 32 [17

To take property back

Where a tortious levy of attachment is made upon the property of one not a party to the process, and he files statutory claim to the property, and the levying officer holds the property in his possession awaiting the decision of the court, the claimant, upon recovering a judgment finding the property not subject, cannot refuse to take it back from the officer and hold the person causing the levy to be made liable for its full market value.—Maxwell v. Speth, 72 S.E. 292, 9 Ga. App. 745.

C.J. p 769 notes 25, 26], a person whose property has been wrongfully attached as that of another need use only ordinary efforts and make only a reasonable expenditure to minimize the damages.[42] Accordingly, it has been held that he is under no duty to minimize his damages by giving bond to secure a release of the property, or to make application to the court to have the property released from the levy,[43] although, where plaintiff seeks to recover profits lost because of the wrongful seizure, it has been held that an attempt to replevy the property or to secure other property to take its place was necessary.[44]

Nominal damages. Where there is no evidence of actual damages caused by the wrongful levy on plaintiff's property, he is entitled to recover only nominal damages.[45]

Punitive, exemplary, or vindictive damages. Under permissive statutes, where the attachment was malicious or willful, punitive or exemplary damages may be recovered,[46] if specially pleaded.[47] To justify a recovery of punitive damages, however, requisites imposed by statute such as malice, lack of probable cause, or a willful and wanton trespass, must be present, and, under this requirement, where it appears that defendant acted in good faith in suing out the attachment, compensatory damages alone are recoverable.[48]

XI. DISSOLUTION, QUASHAL, OR VACATION

A. IN GENERAL

§ 406. General Statement

To avoid the effect of an attachment, the writ should be dissolved in the manner prescribed by statute.

In order to avoid entirely the effect of an attachment, it is necessary that the writ be dissolved, vacated, or quashed by proper proceedings,[49] and until such action is taken the attachment remains valid.[50] However, attachment is a statutory remedy and may be destroyed only in the manner prescribed by statute.[51]

One seeking to arrest the operation of an attachment statute by reason of an assignment for creditors in a foreign state must establish the validity or legal effect of the assignment under the laws of the state where it was made, and no presumption of validity or legal effect of the assignment will be indulged.[52]

§ 407. Matters Operating as Dissolution or Discharge

Matters which operate as an automatic dissolution or discharge of an attachment, since they also serve to destroy the attachment lien, have been discussed under the sections relating to the release or discharge of the lien (§§ 261–270).

§ 408. —— Appearance

A mere appearance and pleading to an action is not sufficient to discharge an attachment under modern statutes.

Since the early theory of foreign attachment had for its purpose the enforcement of an appearance and the obsolete practice of requiring bail to complete the appearance, some weight has been given to the argument that an appearance dissolves an attachment;[53] but where the attachment

In Missouri the statute provides that, when an attachment is issued against a nonresident and plaintiff gives no bond, the attachment shall be dissolved as of course, on defendant's appearing and answering to the merits.—Bambrick Bros. Const. Co.

seeks more than a mere appearance, under modern statutes which require the giving of a particular bond in order to effect the dissolution of an attachment or the release of the property, an appearance and pleading to the action will not discharge the attachment,[54] and this has been held to be so even though defendant may appear and confess judgment.[55]

§ 409. —— Causes Subsequent to Attachment in General

Those matters occurring subsequent to the time of attachment which may sometimes operate to dissolve or discharge an attachment lien or, as it is otherwise stated, to discharge the attachment, have been discussed in §§ 262–263.

§ 410. —— Proceedings in Action

The attachment and the lien obtained thereunder may be discharged by certain proceedings in the main action, as shown in § 268 a.

§ 411. —— Termination of Action without Judgment

The loss of the attachment lien or the dissolution of the attachment due to a discontinuance, dismissal, or nonsuit in the main proceedings is reviewed in § 268 b.

§ 412. —— Judgment for Plaintiff

The effect of a judgment for plaintiff in the main proceeding upon the attachment, or, more properly, the attachment lien, has been considered in § 268 c.

§ 413. —— Judgment for Defendant

The effect of a judgment for defendant upon an attachment taken by plaintiff has been discussed in § 268 d.

§ 414. —— Failure to Issue, Levy, or Enforce Execution

A failure to order execution following judgment may cause the loss of an attachment as has been shown in § 268 e

§ 415. —— Death of Party

Since the death of a party to an attachment operates on the attachment lien as well as on the attachment itself, all such cases have been discussed in § 266.

§ 416. Grounds for Dissolution or Discharge

Since an attachment may be obtained only by special proceedings and on particular grounds, any departure from such requirements may serve as a ground for quashing, dissolving, or vacating it.

Since special proceedings and particular grounds are necessary to authorize an attachment of property, a defendant may raise issues regarding the validity of the attachment without touching on the merits of the claim involved in the action in which the writ issued,[56] while, on the other hand, objections which go to the action itself are not necessarily available as grounds for dissolving the attachment.[57] The fact that plaintiff obtains and levies a second attachment is no ground for dissolution of the second one,[58] and the fact that a prior attachment in another court has been dissolved is not ground for quashing a second attachment.[59] Service of summons on a nonresident in the county in which the summons is issued does not abate an attachment.[60] An improperly issued attachment should be discharged.[61] A foreign attachment may be quashed upon the proof of facts not disclosed in the record.[62] The failure of a

Existence of a chattel mortgage on attached property covering defendant's indebtedness to plaintiff is not ground for dissolution of the attachment where plaintiff alleged in the affidavit for attachment that the mortgage had become valueless without his fault—Republic Truck Sales Corporation v. plaintiff to register an assumed name under which he was doing business cannot be taken advantage of by a motion to quash.[63]

Vacation without grounds. Where no grounds for a vacation of attachment exist, the court is without authority to set it aside.[64]

Two or more grounds for dissolution may be relied on in the same proceeding.[65]

Laches of plaintiff in failing to prosecute the case vigorously is ground for dissolution.[66]

§ 417. —— Failure of Plaintiff to Show Cause of Action

The failure of plaintiff's pleadings in the attachment suit to show a cause of action is a sufficient ground for a motion to dissolve the attachment.

It is sufficient ground for a motion to dissolve an attachment that plaintiff's pleadings in an attachment suit fail to show a cause of action,[67] notwithstanding the affidavit is sufficient to warrant the issuance of the writ.[68] However, a mere defective statement of a cause of action is not a sufficient ground for the discharge of an attachment.[69] A failure to set out in the complaint a demand for liquidated damages will not serve to quash the attachment obtained in the action,[70] nor will an uncertainty in the petition as to the amount recoverable warrant a quashal of the attachment.[71] A failure on the part of defendant to prove the insufficiency of the cause of action will result in a refusal to quash the attachment issued.[72]

§ 418. —— Insufficiency of Cause of Action to Support Attachment

It is sufficient ground for quashal of an attachment that the cause of action will not support the attachment.

The fact that the cause of action set up by the attaching plaintiff is not such as will support an attachment is a sufficient ground for a motion for the quashal of an attachment;[73] and this has been held to be true, although the affidavit for attachment does state such a cause of action.[74]

§ 419. —— Errors or Variance as to Amount of Claim and Excessive Claim

The fact that the writ issued for an amount larger than the actual amount due is not a sufficient ground to quash the attachment.

Even though ordinarily an affidavit to procure an attachment is required to state the amount of the attaching plaintiff's claim, it is not a sufficient ground for the vacation of an attachment that the writ was issued for an amount larger than the actual amount due the attaching creditor,[75] although it has been held that, where a writ of attachment issues for the whole amount claimed in several causes of action included in the same pe-

Order of reduction or partial release
When an attachment on real estate is properly made, the court has no authority to annul it, but where the damages alleged are excessive the court may order a reduction of the ad damnum or a partial release of the attachment—Everett v. Cutler Mills, 160 A. 924, 52 R I. 330.

Certain damages without proof
It is not ground for vacating an attachment that the attachment papers make no proof of certain items of damage, if there exists proof of substantial damage outside of those items—Crook v. Lupton, 170 N.Y S. 345, 182 App Div. 353.

tition, and later, before trial, some of such causes are dismissed by plaintiff, a motion to dissolve the attachment should be granted.[76] The test that courts seem to have applied in cases of this kind is good or bad faith in making the claim.[77] While a variance between the affidavit for attachment and the writ issued thereon as to the amount claimed has been held to be a fatal defect,[78] it is not a ground for quashing an attachment that the petition claimed a greater amount than that for which the writ of attachment is issued,[79] for plaintiff is not bound to attach for the full amount of his claim.[80]

§ 420. —— Nonexistence of Grounds of Attachment

The nonexistence of grounds of attachment as alleged in the affidavit is adequate to cause the dissolution of the attachment.

The dissolution of an attachment may be sought on the ground that the statements of the affidavit for the attachment are false in that the grounds of attachment alleged therein do not, or did not at the time when the affidavit was made, exist.[81] Accordingly, an attachment sued out on the ground of nonresidence of defendant must be dissolved where it is shown that he does in fact reside within the state[82] or was present within the county when the writ was issued.[83] A writ based on an allegation that defendant is an absconding debtor must fall where it is shown that he has not in fact absconded;[84] and proof of the absence of any fraudulent intent on the part of defendant requires the vacation of an attachment based on the ground of a fraudulent transfer or concealment of property.[85] In some cases a different view has been asserted which holds that the truth of the affidavit cannot be put in issue on the trial of the attachment suit, and defendant, if he claims that the affidavit is false, must have recourse to his remedy for wrongful attachment.[86]

(2) But other authorities have asserted the view that where one defendant in an attachment against several parties denied the alleged nonresidence of his codefendant, such denial afforded no cause for quashing the writ—Warren v. Winterstein, 72 N W 600, 114 Mich. 647—6 C J. p 424 note 20 [e] (2)

Question of whether defendant was a resident of the state, temporarily absent, or was a nonresident, cannot be raised in an attachment suit by special appearance or otherwise—Security Sav. Bank v Cimprich, 208 N W. 24, 199 Iowa 1061.

Suit on attachment bond, wherein the grounds of attachment may be attacked, is the attachment defendant's sole remedy for a wrongful issuing of attachment.—Security Sav.

Where an allegation of two or more grounds of attachment is made in the affidavit, the nonexistence of one of them is not a sufficient reason for a dissolution of the writ, if one sufficient ground is established [87]

Reasonable cause for believing existence of grounds The fact that an attaching creditor had reasonable cause for believing that the alleged grounds of attachment existed will not, according to the weight of authority, prevent the vacation of the writ where it is made to appear that such alleged grounds did not in fact exist.[88]

Rights of third person. A third person claiming an interest in the property levied on cannot intervene to question the grounds for the issuance of the writ,[89] in the absence of fraud or collusion between the attaching creditor and the debtor.[90]

§ 421. —— Want of Jurisdiction

A lack of jurisdiction is a sufficient ground for dismissing the entire attachment proceeding.

A sufficient ground for dismissing an entire attachment proceeding exists where jurisdiction is lacking.[91] Mere nonresidence of the creditor is not ground for quashing an attachment[92] and the fact that both of the parties to a suit were nonresidents when the cause of action accrued and when the suit was brought is no ground for abating the attachment where there was no fraud on the jurisdiction of the court.[93] Where a nonresident defendant received a directed verdict determining that he had no interest in the property attached, the trial court should dissolve the attachment of its own motion.[94]

§ 422. —— Improper Levy

The fact that property was improperly levied on is not sufficient ground for setting aside a writ of attachment.

It is not a sufficient ground for setting aside a writ of attachment that property was improperly levied upon, although it may be ground for setting aside the levy.[95] Where there is an excessive levy, the error should be corrected by procuring a release of the property in excess of what is sufficient to satisfy the writ and not by discharging the attachment altogether.[96]

§ 423. —— Defects in Proceedings to Obtain Attachment

A mere defect or irregularity in the proceedings will not cause a dissolution, quashal, or vacation of the attachment, but an error therein must be material to cause such action.

Notwithstanding the fact that the proceedings by which the writ was obtained are defective is always a sufficient ground for demanding the dissolution, quashal, or vacation of an attachment,[97] the writ will not be quashed for every defect or slight irregularity in the proceedings, but the error must be material in order to warrant such action by the court.[98] Although the irregularities which

Effect of statute as to amendments

Comp L (1913) § 7561, dealing expressly with the discharge of attachments irregularly issued, is not controlled or affected by §§ 7482, 7483, giving the trial court discretionary power to allow amendments to any pleading, process, or proceeding—Golden Valley County v. Curtin, 203 N.W. 189, 52 N D 372.

Failure to serve garnishee is not ground for dissolution—Benoski v Adams Co, 18 Ohio Cir.Ct.(N S.) 473.

warrant a dissolution of the writ will usually appear on the face of the affidavit or undertaking to procure attachment, or by comparison with the summons and complaint,[99] it is not essential that this should be the case; but defects or irregularities which are not so apparent may be shown[1] The fact that a defect in the proceedings has been cured before a hearing on a rule or motion to dissolve the attachment because of such defect has been held sufficient to preclude a dissolution for that reason[2] A motion to discharge the attachment on the pleadings and attachment papers must be based on the pleadings and papers as amended at the time of the motion.[3]

Junior attaching creditors, although entitled to intervene, cannot defeat a prior attachment by showing mere irregularities which were waived by the debtor himself,[4] and can only set up fraud or collusion by which they have been prejudiced,[5] or such imperfections as render the proceedings void.[6]

Defects or irregularities sufficient to warrant vacation of writ. It has been held to be sufficient ground for the dissolution, quashal, or vacation of an attachment that the writ was issued without a lawful affidavit[7] or bond,[8] or an order directing the issuance thereof;[9] that the affidavit,[10] bond,[11] or writ[12] is defective in matter of substance; that the writ was issued prior to the issuance of any summons or defendant's appearance,[13] that no service of summons has been made on defendant, either personally or by publication, as required by statute,[14] that the service was defective,[15] that no compliance was had with the provisions requiring posting of the citation and writ,[16] that the sum claimed in an action aided by attachment for the contract price of the goods sold is merely averred in the affidavit and not established by proof,[17] that the certified copy of the writ was not entered within the time allowed by statute,[18] that the officer failed to file an inventory of the property attached,[19] that the marshal attached property outside of his jurisdiction, which he had no right to do;[20] or that there was no actual seizure of the property by the officer.[21]

Defects or irregularities not sufficient to warrant vacation of writ. It has been held to be not a sufficient ground for the dissolution, quashal, or vacation of an attachment that there are trivial de-sheriff failed to take the attached goods into his possession;[44] that the certificate of the affidavit and of the acknowledgment and approval of the bond was made in the name of the clerk by his deputy,[45] or that no bill of particulars was annexed to the original papers.[46] Where a part of the debt sued for is due and a part not due, and the affidavit required by statute where attachment is sought for a debt not due is not filed, the writ may stand as to the part due and be dismissed as to the part not due, but it cannot be quashed on motion.[47] Where plaintiff in his affidavit for attachment unites several causes of action, some of which are stated with sufficient precision to sustain the attachment and some of which are not so stated, a motion to vacate the attachment in toto is properly denied,[48] but defendant may move to reduce the amount to be secured by the attachment to that involved in the causes of action which are sufficiently stated.[49] When the defect is one that may be cured by amendment, defendant is not entitled to have the writ dismissed as against a subsequent motion for leave to amend.[50]

§ 424. —— Fraud

The use of fraudulent means to obtain an attachment or attachment levy is a sufficient ground for vacating it.

Fraudulent method employed by the attaching creditor will serve as a sufficient ground for the quashal or vacation of his attachment,[51] but on the failure to prove such deceit, the attachment will be affirmed and approved.[52] The use of fraud in procuring a levy on the attached property has been held sufficient to justify an application to have the attachment dissolved.[53]

§ 425. —— Pendency of Another Action

The pendency of a second action will not of itself serve to dissolve an attachment obtained in a prior action on the same cause.

Where another action is pending for the same cause of action as that on which an attachment was sued out, the pendency of the second action has been considered not of itself sufficient to warrant a dissolution of the writ.[54] Although it has been held that, where an attachment was issued in the earlier action, another attachment issued in the later action should be dissolved,[55] at least where both attachments were sued out in the same county.[56] An attachment of property in one state will not bar the right to issue a writ of the same nature in another state, even when the assets bound by the first writ might be sufficient to pay the demand.[57]

§ 426. —— Lack of Interest in Attached Property

The fact that the defendant has no interest in the property attached is not a ground for a motion by him to dissolve the attachment, although it may afford a ground to a third person claimant.

Courts have, as a rule, considered as insufficient to warrant a vacation of an attachment the fact that defendant in attachment has no interest in the property levied on, since, ordinarily, defendant will not be injured by seizure of property which he does not own,[58] but where the attachment was

Attachment without declaration filed does not void attachment subsequently filed

The pendency of an attachment in which no declaration was filed at the first term will not abate a second attachment between the same parties under which the same property was seized and in which a declaration was duly filed —Drake v. Lewis, (Ga. App) 79 S E 167.

Appeal from order vacating prior attachment

Where attachments in one court have been vacated for irregularity, and the suits dismissed, and the costs paid, the pendency of an appeal from the judgments vacating the attachments and dismissing the suits does not preclude the issuing of attachments for the same cause in subsequent suits by the same plaintiff against the same defendant in another court —Haviland v Wehle, 11 Abb Pr N.S. resorted to in order to obtain jurisdiction, a nonresident defendant has been allowed to show his lack of interest in the property attached for the purpose of ousting the court of jurisdiction.[59]

On a claim of an intervener the attachment may be dissolved where it appears that a portion of the property belongs to the intervener and a portion to defendant and the amount belonging to each is not evident,[60] or where it appears that attachment defendant was not the owner of the property or of any interest therein.[61] On the other hand, where the intervener fails to establish any title to the property, an order dissolving the attachment should be set aside.[62]

§ 427. —— Property Not Subject to Attachment

The fact that property attached was not legally subject to seizure is usually an insufficient ground for dissolution

It is usually not a sufficient ground for dissolving a writ of attachment that the property levied on thereunder was not legally subject to seizure under the writ.[63]

§ 428. —— Miscellaneous Grounds

An attachment may be vacated or dissolved on miscellaneous grounds other than those hereinbefore specifically mentioned.

It has been held that where an attachment is issued on an alleged indebtedness, and the evidence shows that the indebtedness was not joint, the proceeding must be quashed.[64] It has been held that where a fund, on deposit in a bank and attached in an action in a federal court as property of defendant therein, was claimed by others, not parties, and an action was instituted in a state court against the bank for the recovery of the fund, it was the duty of plaintiff in the federal court to appear in such action and submit his rights to adjudication therein for the protection of the bank, and that unless he did so the attachment would be vacated.[65] A colorable transfer of a just cause of action against a foreign corporation by a nonresident to a resident of a particular state, for the purpose of enabling the assignee to maintain an action by attachment in the courts of that state for the real benefit of the assignor, does not render an attachment obtained by the assignee void or subject to be attacked by junior attaching creditors of the common debtor.[66]

A statute authorizing a junior attaching creditor to dispute a prior attachment on the ground that the sum demanded in the first suit was not justly due, or was not payable when the suit was commenced, and authorizing him to file a petition of intervention in the same suit, does not authorize such intervention on the ground that the debt of the senior creditor has been paid subsequently to the commencement of the suit[67]

A tender by defendant before suit was brought of the amount of the decree, except the interest, is no ground for discharging the attachment and declaring the bond released, where no money has been paid into court.[68]

Further or collateral security. An attachment issued because defendant made a mortgage on land with intent to defraud his creditors will not be vacated because defendant offers to give the attaching creditor a further mortgage on the land.[69] but under some statutes, an attachment may be dissolved on a filing of the proper bond.[70] An attachment will not be dissolved due to a pledge of accounts as security when it is shown that the accounts have become valueless without any act of the creditor.[71] It is not sufficient ground for dissolving an attachment that a proceeding is pending to foreclose a chattel mortgage securing the claim sued on,[72] or that plaintiff seeks, in the same proceeding, to foreclose a lien on property held as security for the claim, where the security is insufficient.[73] A discharge of an attachment may be obtained on the ground that the debt is secured, and the fact that the creditor's security was located in another state does not prevent such action.[74] A release of an attachment on certain realty is not justified by the fact that a bond was given to release the personalty attached at the same time.[75]

B. JURISDICTION AND FORM OF REMEDY

§ 429. Jurisdiction to Quash, Vacate, or Dissolve

An application to quash, vacate, or dissolve an attachment should be made to the court before which the action in connection with which the writ issued is brought.

Attachment, especially when a suit is pending, is a process of the court over which such court has the inherent power of control,[76] and as a general rule an application to vacate or set aside an attachment should be made to the court before which the action involving the issued writ was brought, or before a judge of such court.[77] However, in some jurisdictions it is expressly provided that the application for relief from an attachment may be made to a designated officer of the court, such as a court commissioner[78] or the clerk.[79]

Although attachment is released by the direction of plaintiff, the court may properly grant a motion to discharge.[80]

Where an attachment has been discharged by giving bond for that purpose, as discussed in § 313, the court has no jurisdiction subsequently to discharge the attachment for the reason that there is no longer any attachment to be discharged.[81]

§ 430. Form of Remedy in General

The party securing the writ cannot discharge it of his own motion, but the procedure prescribed by statute or local rule must be pursued.

The determination that a writ of attachment should not have been issued or that it shall be discharged is a judicial function which the party securing the writ cannot perform for himself, nor can he procure it to be performed by officers who act merely ministerially.[82] The procedure shall be in accordance with that, if any, which is prescribed by applicable statutes.[83] As will be seen in the following sections, an attachment may be dissolved or vacated by the court of its own motion or on a motion or rule to show cause or by a plea in abatement. Although in some jurisdictions the right of a plaintiff to attachment may be determined on exception,[84] objections cannot ordinarily be raised by a demurrer[85] or on appeal,[86] where the objection was not raised in the trial court.[87]

§ 431. Action by Court ex Mero Motu

The court may ex mero motu quash, dissolve, or vacate an attachment irregularly issued.

Where an attachment has been irregularly issued, it is within the power of the court to quash or dismiss the same ex mero motu and without any application for such action by defendant or any other person.[88]

§ 432. Motion to Modify Attachment

In the case of an excessive or unreasonable attachment, a defendant may have a remedy by motion to modify.

The court may on proper showing reduce the amount of the attachment or dissolve it entirely, if justice requires.[89] So, where an attachment is issued on an indebtedness, only part of which is in reality due, a motion for a modification of the writ on that ground is proper.[90]

§ 433. Motion or Rule to Show Cause

Under the practice in some jurisdictions the proper procedure to discharge or dissolve an attachment is by motion or rule to show cause.

While, as will be seen in the following section, a plea in abatement may properly be resorted to where defects relied on to defeat an attachment are not apparent on the face of the proceedings, in a number of states the statutes permit application to dissolve the attachment because of matters outside the record to be made by a motion or rule to show cause why the writ should not be dissolved,[91] the application in such case being supported by affidavits[92] or other evidence[93] in the form of depositions,[94] or oral testimony,[95] or by the compelling of production of books and papers,[96] as the statutes may provide. Where matters apparent on the face of the record are relied on to defeat the attachment, they may be taken advantage of ordinarily by a motion to quash the writ or to dissolve the attachment,[97] which raises issues of law[98] and is treated substantially as a demurrer to a pleading,[99] although there is authority to the effect that a motion to discharge cannot be made to perform the office of a demurrer to the complaint.[1] Further facts alleged in the motion cannot for its purposes be made a part of the petition or record by its mere filing.[2]

A motion to quash or dissolve an attachment is in the nature of a plea in abatement, and, if successful, has the same effect.[3]

§ 434. Plea in Abatement

A proper method of seeking the dissolution of an attachment on grounds not apparent of record is by a plea in abatement or a plea in the nature thereof.

of the proceeding, a plea in abatement or a plea in the nature of such a plea is the usual,[4] and, in some jurisdictions, the only available[5] method of presenting the objection. So, it is proper to raise the untruth of plaintiff's allegations as to the grounds for attachment by such a plea.[6]

A plea traversing the allegations of the affidavit for attachment is permitted in a number of jurisdictions,[7] and amounts to practically the same thing as a plea in abatement, as it merely goes to defeat the attachment, leaving the merits of the case untouched.[8]

C. PERSONS ENTITLED TO MOVE OR PLEAD

§ 435. Defendant in Attachment

The defendant in attachment is entitled to move or plead for a dissolution, quashal, or vacation thereon if grounds therefor exist.

Since defendant in attachment is, under ordinary circumstances, the person most affected, if not the only person affected, by issuance and levy of the writ, it naturally follows that he is entitled to move or plead for a dissolution, quashal, or vacation thereon in case any of the grounds therefor exist,[9] and it has been held that no other person has this right,[10] unless, as is very generally the case, the statutes or local practice rules authorize other persons who might have a remedy against the attachment in a court of equity to resort to the more convenient and expeditious method of determining the controversy in the original suit.[11]

§ 436. —— Ownership of Property as Bearing on Right

A motion to dissolve an attachment based on other grounds cannot be defeated by showing that the defendant had no interest in the property at the time of the levy thereon.

Even though a defendant cannot ordinarily proceed for a dissolution of an attachment on the ground that he has no interest in the property levied on, as shown in § 426, a motion or plea based on other grounds cannot, as a rule, be defeated by showing that defendant had no interest in the property at the time of the levy thereon,[12] although there is authority to the contrary,[13] for

Cause of action not authorizing attachment.
Where an attachment is sued out for a cause of action on which the statutes do not authorize its issue, the irregularity cannot be reached by a plea in abatement or by a motion to quash it. The proper method of reaching the objection, where the writ will not lie for the enforcement of the action, is a rule on plaintiff to show cause against the dissolution of the writ and its levy, and the motion must precede a plea to the merits.—Cooper v. the reason that plaintiff in attachment, having by the levy asserted that the property is that of defendant, is estopped to assert the contrary.[14] However, as such action on the part of the attaching plaintiff cannot of course estop him to assert that defendant has subsequently parted with his interest in the property, it is held by some authorities that a transfer by defendant of all his interest in the attached property, subsequent to the seizure, precludes him from moving to dissolve the attachment.[15]

§ 437. —— Waiver or Estoppel

A defendant may by his own acts waive or be estopped from claiming his right to seek a dissolution of the attachment.

Where defendant consents to an attachment,[16] by his conduct waives his right to assert defects in the attachment,[17] delays in objecting thereto,[18] appears generally in the action,[19] or agrees, after seizure of the attached property, that the sheriff shall sell summarily and retain the proceeds until final judgment,[20] he may preclude himself from insisting on a dissolution of the writ, and where a defense to the main action has been waived defendant cannot set up such defense to defeat the attachment proceedings.[21] However, a mere request by defendant for a suspension of legal proceedings has been held not to estop him from moving to vacate for plaintiff's failure to publish within the time prescribed by statute;[22] nor is a motion to vacate an attachment waived by the subsequent filing of affidavits denying the truth of the matters alleged in the affidavit for attachment.[23] The execution of a replevy bond in an attachment does not have the effect of precluding defendant from quashing the writ of attachment for defects in the affidavit therefor.[24] A failure of defendant to plead to the merits of the action will not debar him from filing a plea in abatement denying the existence of the grounds for attachment;[25] nor is defendant precluded from insisting on a non-jurisdictional reason for dissolution because of the fact that in his petition to quash he also set up a reason going to the jurisdiction.[26]

§ 438. Assignee or Grantee of Defendant

An assignee or vendee of a defendant in attachment may be allowed to move for the dissolution of the writ.

Although the right in some instances has been denied,[27] it is generally accepted that an assignee of defendant in attachment may move or plead for the dissolution of the writ,[28] unless he has waived this right,[29] or unless a similar motion made by defendant, his assignor, has been denied.[30] A grantee or vendee of defendant subsequent to the

No estoppel as to subsequent complaint

Defendant, by a general appearance in an action for damages instituted by an affidavit averring the existence of a debt for which attachment would lie, was not estopped, on a subsequent filing of a complaint stating a cause of action for which an attachment would not lie, to move to strike such complaint and to quash the writ.—Noah MacDowell & Co v Edward & John Burke, Limited, 130 A. 199, 3 N J Misc 740.

Effect of overruling motion by assignee on right of successor to move

Where the statutory assignee of defendant has moved to dissolve the attachment, and such motion has been overruled, a similar motion by his successor without leave of court may properly be stricken from the files.—Hillyer v Biglow, 28 P. 150, 47 Kan 473.

attachment of the property conveyed is sometimes allowed to assail the attachment.[31] A person in whose hands real property is specially attached as belonging to another, but is standing fraudulently in his name, may move to dissolve the special attachment under a statute permitting defendant or the person whose property has been attached on mesne process to move to reduce or discharge the attachment.[32]

§ 439. Receiver, Trustee in Insolvency, or Personal Representative, of Defendant

The right of a receiver, trustee in bankruptcy or insolvency, or personal representative of attachment defendant to move for a dissolution, quashal, or vacation of the attachment writ is discussed in the titles Bankruptcy § 212 [7 C.J. p 146 note 51]; Executors and Administrators § 750 [6 C.J. p 435 note 14]; Insolvency § 11 [6 C.J. p 435 note 13]; and Receivers § 342 [6 C.J. p 434 note 12].

§ 440. Creditors of Defendant

Defendant's creditors other than the one attaching may be permitted to contest attachment and to move for dissolution.

Other creditors of defendant than the one who sued out an attachment are sometimes permitted to contest the attachment,[33] and, accordingly, a judgment creditor of defendant in attachment has been held entitled to move or plead for a dissolution of the attachment.[34] On a motion to vacate an attachment by a junior attaching creditor, the court will not scrutinize the complaint and affidavits as closely as when the motion is made by defendant whose property was attached.[35]

§ 441. Holder of Lien on Property Attached

A lienholder on property levied on under an attachment may defend against the attachment.

A person having a lien on the property levied on under an attachment is usually permitted to defend against the attachment,[36] provided his objections are substantial and not based on mere irregularities in the proceedings which have been waived by defendant himself.[37]

§ 442. Claimant of Attached Property

A claimant of the property attached may under some circumstances move for quashal of the attachment.

A person who claims ownership in the property attached has been held to have a right to be heard on his intervening by a motion to discharge the attachment,[38] but it has also been held that such person's remedy is by a claim of the property and an interpleader to determine the title, rather than by intervention in the attachment proceedings.[39] An intervener may, according to some authorities, move to quash the attachment on grounds other than such ownership,[40] but not on the ground of such ownership.[41]

§ 443. Sureties on Replevy Bond

Sureties on bond to replevy attached property may intervene and move to dissolve.

Sureties on a bond given to replevy attached property have been allowed to intervene and set up a defect in the affidavit.[42]

§ 444. Garnishee

The right of a garnishee to plead or object against an attachment taken on the property of the creditor of the garnishor is discussed in section 199 of the title Garnishment [6 C.J. p 437 notes 22, 23].

§ 445. Plaintiff in Attachment

A motion to dissolve the writ cannot be made by the plaintiff in attachment.

§ 446. Other Persons

Although having an interest in the property seized, one cannot, as amicus curiæ, move or plead for the dissolution of an attachment, as is discussed in section 3 of the title Amicus Curiæ. Also, as will be shown in section 1930 of the title Corporations, a domestic corporation cannot move to vacate an attachment against a similar, named corporation on the ground that its property has been taken under the attachment. For subsequent cases which may arise consult Pocket Parts.

D. PROCEEDINGS

§ 447. Proceedings on Motion

The proceedings on a motion to quash or dissolve an attachment or to show cause why it should not be quashed or dissolved will be considered in detail in the subsequent sections.

§ 448. —— Necessity for General Appearance in Action

A general appearance is required in some jurisdictions when moving for the vacation of an attachment, but in others it is held unnecessary.

In some jurisdictions a defendant may move to vacate an attachment without appearing generally in the action,[44] while in others such a motion cannot be made without a general appearance to the action.[45]

§ 449. —— Time for Motion

A motion to vacate or discharge an attachment must be made within the time, if any, fixed by applicable statutes and rules of court unless the court in its discretion permits the making of the motion out of time.

While a statute requiring objections of a particular character to be made within a specified time must be followed, it has no application to cases not within its provisions.[46] In general a defendant may make a motion to quash or vacate an attachment as soon as he comes before the court[47] but the time within which he must move is dependent on the applicable statutes and rules of court. Thus by some of such provisions defendant is required to move at the very outset of the proceedings, either at the return term of the writ or as soon thereafter as possible,[48] or within the time prescribed for pleading in abatement,[49] or within the time for answer,[50] or within a reasonable time after appearance,[51] and cannot be allowed to present such a motion after he has pleaded to the merits or in bar to the main action,[52] or has filed a plea in abatement of the attachment;[53] but in other jurisdictions a more lenient rule prevails, and defendant can make his motion to quash at any time before trial[54] or final judgment.[55]

After judgment. While defendant may, in some states, move to quash the writ even after judgment,[56] if the proceeds of the attached property have not been applied in satisfaction of the judgment,[57] the general rule is that no motion to vacate or quash can be made after final judgment.[58]

Effect of delay. It is within the sound discretion of the trial court to strike out defendant's motion to quash the levy of attachment and his plea in abatement of the attachment where they were made out of time and without the leave of court.[59]

§ 450. —— Notice of Motion

Notice of the motion is ordinarily a statutory prerequisite.

Notice to plaintiff of a motion to dissolve or vacate is usually held to be essential,[60] but it has been held that such notice is unnecessary where the motion is founded on plaintiff's application and proofs.[61]

It is required generally that such notice shall specify the grounds on which is based the motion to quash or dissolve.[62] Where the motion is based on irregularity in the proceedings, the notice must point out the irregularity on which the moving party intends to rely,[63] but this is not considered necessary where the defect is more than a mere irregularity.[64]

Time for giving notice. The statutes sometimes require notice within a specified time before the return day,[65] while other statutes require merely a reasonable notice of the motion.[66] In the latter case the reasonableness of the notice will be determined by the circumstances and conditions existing at the time the matter was to be presented.[67]

Service. The notice must be served on plaintiff in attachment if he resides in, or is to be found within, the county,[68] or otherwise upon his agent or attorney,[69] and service is sometimes required to be made by reading the notice to the person served.[70]

§ 451. —— Requisites of Motion

The motion must be sufficiently definite to present the ground relied on.

A motion to quash or vacate an attachment must in general be specific as to the ground relied on,[71] which must be one which shows the invalidity of the proceedings,[72] although unless the requirement is imposed by statute the motion need not contain all of the elements of a traversing plea,[73] and where the statute provides generally that the motion may be on the ground that the attachment was improperly or irregularly issued it is unnecessary that a motion based on affidavits be more precise than the statutory language, but the affidavits must be specific and precise.[74] However, where an attachment is attacked for jurisdictional defects, the attachment may be vacated although no specific irregularities in the attachment papers are pointed out[75] or although erro-

Defects in affidavit

(1) Specifications, in mere general terms, that an affidavit for attachment does not conform with provisions of Code Civ.Proc. § 538, and that the attachment was improperly and irregularly issued, are not sufficiently specific to sustain a motion or order for discharge of the writ.—Republic Truck Sales Corporation v. Peak, 229 P. 331, 194 Cal. 492.

(2) An objection that there was "no sufficient affidavit filed" is too general to be the basis of an adjudication.—Gill v. Physicians' and Surgeons' Bldg., 138 A. 674, 153 Md. 394.

Defects in the bond must be specifically pointed out.—Wiggins v. L. Jonas & Co., 106 S.E. 927, 26 Ga.App. 706.

Forms of motion to dissolve attachments.—West v. Woolfolk, 21 Fla. 189—Kilpatrick v. O'Connell, 62 Md. 403

Amendment

Where defendant's original motion to discharge an attachment was sufficient, the allowance of an amendment to the motion was not error.—Fawkner, Currie & Co. v. Sanitary Fish Co., 177 P. 708, 105 Wash. 88.

74. Fawkner, Currie & Co. v. Sanitary Fish Co., supra.

Irregular or improvident

A motion to dissolve an attachment will not be held too indefinite where it is based on the grounds that the attachment was irregularly issued and that it was improvidently granted, although it did not specify any irregularities and did not specify any particulars wherein the warrant had been issued improvidently, but merely referred to the affidavit accompanying the motion.—Brekke v. Waite, 153 N.W. 901, 36 S.D. 26

neous reasons are assigned[76] In general an application is sufficient where it puts in issue the material allegations of plaintiff's petition as to the grounds on which the issuance of the attachment is based[77] A petition in support of an application for the dissolution of an attachment based upon the falsity of the grounds upon which such attachment was issued must deny the existence of the facts alleged in the affidavit;[78] and where the facts stated in the affidavit upon which the attachment was granted are prima facie sufficient to justify the issue thereof, and defendant fails to make any explanation of the same in his motion to vacate, the attachment will not be disturbed.[79] A specification in an affidavit traversing the truth of the affidavit for attachment is insufficient where it constitutes an effort to put in issue the merits of the case rather than the ground for attachment,[80] as where it denies that defendants were indebted to plaintiff in the specific sum alleged.[81]

The motion should, where it is deemed essential to the movant's right to proceed, show that it was defendant's property that was attached[82] and a description of the property should be given[83]

Request for restoration. Upon application to dissolve an attachment levied on realty, it is unnecessary that the petitioner should ask for restoration of the property.[84]

Entitling. Even though a motion to quash or vacate an attachment should ordinarily be entitled in the original cause,[85] this has been held not necessary where the proceedings were before a circuit court commissioner.[86]

Verification. It has been considered that a motion for the dissolution of an attachment should be verified,[87] and also, to the contrary, that such verification is not necessary.[88]

§ 452. —— Supporting Affidavits

Where an application is based on facts outside the record, it must usually be supported by affidavits showing the facts relied on and controverting the grounds supporting the attachment

Where an application to vacate or quash an attachment is based on evidence dehors the record, it is usually supported by affidavits.[89] The supporting affidavits should set out the facts on which the motion to quash or vacate is based,[90] and should contain enough to put in issue the allegations of the affidavit for attachment,[91] although they should not go to the merits of the cause of the action or defense.[92] Where an attachment was issued in a suit by a corporation, an allegation by defendant in an affidavit to quash, made on information and belief without giving the sources of his information or the grounds of his belief that the action had been commenced without authority of the board of directors, was held insufficient to raise an issue[93]

A verified answer may be used as an affidavit so far as its contents are pertinent,[94] as may also

Affidavit of merits
Where a defendant, in support of his motion to dissolve an attachment as to him, filed an affidavit in which he set forth that he was a resident of the state, and that the money attached belonged to him, there was a sufficient affidavit of merits, since, in view of Code Civ Proc § 557, the motion might have been made without any affidavit—Willett & Burr v Alpert, 185 P 976, 181 Cal. 652.

Denial of debt
Where plaintiff obtained a writ of attachment, under Attachment Act § 1 subd 2, an ex parte affidavit of defendant's agent, denying existence of the debt, is not sufficient to support a motion to quash writ—Robinson v. Mellon, 126 A. 863, 2 N J Misc. 1184

the verified pleading of plaintiff.[95]

Showing right to move Where the motion is made by a person other than defendant in attachment, his supporting affidavits should show the facts which give him the right to move.[96] Where it was plainly stated in affidavits filed in support of a motion to discharge an attachment that affiants were the defendants, their true names being slightly changed in the attachment proceedings, it was held that, the affidavits not being denied, the court would treat the affiants as defendants and not as strangers or intruders.[97] A junior attaching creditor must present, as part of his motion papers, the papers upon which his own attachment is founded.[98]

Showing present condition of action. It is sometimes required that the supporting affidavits shall state the present condition of the action, and, if it has not been tried, the time appointed for holding the next term, where the action is triable.[99]

Traversing, explaining, or avoiding plaintiff's evidence. After plaintiff has filed his affidavit or other evidence to sustain the averment made by him to obtain the issue of the attachment writ, defendant may in some jurisdictions file such affidavits or other evidence as he desires or relies upon to traverse, explain, or avoid the case made by plaintiff's evidence.[1]

§ 453. —— Opposing Affidavits

Where an attachment has been challenged by a motion to vacate supported by affidavit, the plaintiff may file affidavits in opposition of such motion and in support of the attachment.

Where an application to discharge or vacate an attachment is made upon a motion supported by affidavit, plaintiff is allowed to file affidavits in opposition to such motion and in support of his attachment,[2] but such a course is not permissible where the motion to vacate is made upon the original papers.[3] On a motion to dissolve an attachment, plaintiff's verified pleading stands as an affidavit.[4]

Scope. The new proof which plaintiff is allowed to use in opposition to a motion to vacate is, as a rule, limited to affidavits tending to sustain the grounds of attachment originally relied on,[5] or to contradict, answer, or explain the affidavits read in support of the motion;[6] and affidavits tending merely to remedy defects in, or to qualify, the papers on which the attachment was originally granted should not be heard,[7] unless, of course, the statute permits new or additional proof on the hearing of such a motion.[8]

Order for filing of affidavits. It has been held that where the grounds for the issuance of an attachment are alleged in the language of the statute, the defendant denies by affidavit the truth of the averments made to obtain such attachment, and moves to dissolve the same, the court before which the proceeding is pending should by an order require plaintiff in attachment, within a reasonable, fixed time, to file such affidavits or other evidence as he desires or relies on to sustain the averments made by him to obtain the issuance of the writ, and defendant, within a reasonable, fixed time thereafter, to file such affidavits or other evidence as he desires or relies on to traverse, explain, or avoid the case made by plaintiff's evidence, and plaintiff, in a reasonable, fixed time thereafter, to file such affidavits or other evidence as is applicable in rebuttal[9] In some jurisdictions where defendant files an affidavit denying some material allegation of the attachment affidavit,[10] plaintiff may be compelled by rule to file an affidavit showing his cause of action,[11] failing in which the attachment will be dissolved[12] Such an affidavit should be explicit and should state with due particularity the facts constituting the ground of action.[13]

Amending or filing supplemental affidavit. According to some decisions, where plaintiff is ruled to show his cause of action and his affidavit is insufficient to sustain the attachment, he cannot amend[14] or file supplementary affidavits;[15] but other cases hold that it is within the discretion of the court to allow an amendment[16] or the filing of a supplementary affidavit.[17]

§ 454. —— Issues

The issue to be determined on a motion to dissolve is whether or not the writ should have been issued.

The sole issue before the court on a motion for the dissolution, quashal, or vacation of an attachment is whether or not the writ should have been issued,[18] and it is not proper for the court to enter upon any consideration of the merits of the action in connection with which the attachment was sued out[19] save in exceptional cases,[20] such as where the moving papers are hopelessly bad,[21] where it is certain that the complaint is so defective that plaintiff cannot recover,[22] or where the facts are undisputed and a legal conclusion is certain[23] Defendant may, however, advance pertinent facts to explain how the transactions out of which the suit originated arose,[24] and the fact that an inquiry into the existence of the grounds of attachment alleged incidentally involves some of the allegations in the petition in the principal action does not require the court to refuse to consider the motion[25] or to suspend decision thereon until the final trial of the cause.[26] On a motion to quash, based on the original papers, the essential statements in an affidavit for attachment are not traversable but must, for the purposes of the motion, be taken as true.[27]

Upon a motion to vacate or discharge, no pleading controverting the motion is ordinarily required or allowed,[28] all the grounds of the motion standing as denied without any pleading in behalf of plaintiff.[29]

Where a motion has been made to quash an attachment, but no jurisdictional defect appears on the face of the proceedings, plaintiff is entitled to frame an issue and contest questions raised outside of the record.[30]

A motion to vacate an attachment "upon the grounds" that it was improvidently issued "and is without warrant of law" raises the issue that the attachment was irregularly as well as improvidently issued.[31]

§ 455. —— Evidence

a. Presumptions
b. Burden of proof
c. Admissibility
d Weight and sufficiency

a. Presumptions

Where a motion to vacate or dissolve is based on the original papers, it will be presumed that the averments in such papers are true.

Where a motion to dissolve or quash an attachment is based upon the original papers on which the attachment was granted, the averments contained in such papers are to be deemed true,[32] and all legitimate deductions and inferences from what appears in such papers must be made and construed in favor of plaintiff,[33] and if such papers show a prima facie case for the attachment this is sufficient.[34]

b. Burden of Proof

While in general the burden of sustaining the attachment is on plaintiff, the moving party may have the burden of proof as to particular matters.

As has been seen in section 69, where the existence of the grounds of attachment have been properly placed in issue, the burden of establishing them is on plaintiff, although there are some authorities which hold that there must be some evidence adduced by defendant that the facts stated in the affidavit are untrue in order to throw the burden of proving their truth on plaintiff.[35] Broadly, however, it may be stated that the burden is on plaintiff to establish the facts necessary to sustain the attachment,[36] although where defendant, without denying the ground on which the writ issued, sets up as an affirmative reason for dissolution some fact which renders the process of attachment unavailable, he has the burden of proof as to such matter.[37] So, where the return of the officer to the writ is regular in form, defendant must show that the writ was not in fact served as stated therein.[38] By some authorities a distinction is pointed out between jurisdictional and nonjurisdictional grounds, the rule announced being that in the case of a jurisdictional ground which goes to the right of the court to hear and try the facts upon which the attachment is based the burden is on defendant, but upon a nonjurisdictional ground the burden is on plaintiff.[39]

to dissolve the attachment because of his ownership of the property or interest therein, without denying the truth of the grounds of the attachment or alleging irregularities in the proceedings therefor, the burden of proof is upon the moving party to establish the matters on which he relies[40] Where judgment creditors of defendant seek the quashal of an attachment upon the ground of collusion between plaintiff and defendant, the burden of proving such collusion rests upon them[41] However, it has been held that where an attachment of an insolvent debtor's goods is attacked by existing creditors as having been sued out through collusion between the debtor and an attaching creditor upon a simulated indebtedness for the purpose of giving the attaching creditor preference, and of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the other creditors of the debtor, the burden is on the attaching creditor to prove clearly and fully that defendant in attachment was indebted to him in the amount claimed in the attachment suit.[42]

c. Admissibility

(1) Motion on original papers
(2) Motion on evidence dehors record

(1) Motion on Original Papers

Where dissolution is sought of an attachment for defects apparent in the proceedings, the court is limited to a consideration of the papers of record in the case.

Upon an application for the dissolution of an attachment for defects apparent in the proceedings, the court is limited to the consideration of the papers of record in the case;[43] and in the absence of error on the face of the record the courts should refuse to vacate or quash the attachment,[44] since defendant by moving on the original papers is deemed to have conceded all the averments of fact contained in the affidavit, and the fair inferences to be drawn therefrom, to be true for the purposes of the motion.[45] In determining whether an attachment was properly issued in the first instance, only the facts existing and before the officer at the time of its issuance may be considered, and not new facts or new grounds for the first time stated at the hearing of the motion to discharge.[46] Hence, where an affidavit is fatally defective in failing to show any one or more of the conditions necessary to the allowance of the attachment, the defect cannot be supplied by affidavit submitted at the hearing of a motion to vacate.[47]

(2) Motion on Evidence Dehors Record

Both parties are entitled to present all the facts which might assist the court where a motion to dissolve the attachment is based upon other than the original papers.

On the hearing of a motion to dissolve or vacate an attachment based upon other than the original papers, both parties are entitled to present all the facts to enable the court to decide whether the ground upon which the warrant was issued in fact existed[48] Accordingly, plaintiff may introduce any proper evidence tending to support his contention that the grounds of attachment relied on by him did exist at the time when the writ was sued out, as shown in section 69, while defendant may introduce any proper evidence legitimately tending to show that the issuance of the writ was improper.[49] However, evidence which is immaterial or irrelevant cannot be admitted.[50]

d. Weight and Sufficiency

A motion seeking the vacation or quashal of an attachment must be supported by evidence sufficient to warrant such an order

In general, in order to entitle the debtor to have an attachment discharged on motion, he must

Abandonment

In determining whether an attachment has been abandoned, the fact that a judgment is merely for amount of the debt, without reference to the attachment, may be considered with other facts—Jordan v Brown Shoe Co, 4 P (2d) 1020, 152 Okl 288.

make a clear and entirely satisfactory showing,[51] but where such showing is made the motion is improperly denied.[52]

Plaintiff's pleadings, where they are evidence before the court on motion to dissolve, are no more conclusive than any other item of evidence before the court.[53]

A mere recital in the moving papers is no evidence of the truth of the allegations on which the motion is based,[54] but an admission in defendant's affidavit in support of the motion may cure a defect in plaintiff's proof.[55]

Where there is counter testimony on a motion to dissolve an attachment, in the absence of evidence upon the part of the attaching party in addition to the affidavit for attachment, the attachment will fall since the assertion of facts in the affidavit is for the purpose of securing the attachment and not of creating evidence as to any issue of fact which may arise thereon in the absence of additional testimony.[56] It has been held that as the affidavit of defendant in support of his motion to vacate the attachment is the evidence of an interested party, the court may refuse to credit it, although the allegations therein are denied in general terms only, and not specifically by the opposing affidavit of plaintiff.[57] An affidavit that plaintiff, on certain representations made to him by defendant's treasurer, subsequently ascertained to be untrue, had been induced to part with a certain sum of money is sufficient to sustain an attachment against an unsupported motion to vacate such writ.[58]

The levy of an attachment in fraud of creditors of the debtor cannot be established by evidence of a general nature and founded largely upon supposition.[59] The mere fact that the officer made a substituted service of summons in an attachment action several days after the writ was issued does not conclusively disprove the allegation of an affidavit as to defendant having left the state and that his residence was unknown to plaintiff.[60] An attachment issued in an action on a note and mortgage on an affidavit setting forth sufficient grounds therefor which are shown to be true should be sustained on a motion to discharge the attachment, where it is shown on the hearing thereof that the mortgaged property is not a sufficient security for the debt, and no sufficient ground for discharging the attachment is shown.[61] Where the whole evidence contained in the affidavits on both sides shows that plaintiff could not have

Lack of jurisdiction

Where lack of jurisdiction in the court depends on the existence of facts alleged in the motion and there is no evidence of any character in support of the motion or otherwise, it is improper to sustain the motion and dissolve the attachment—Tollerton v Woods, (Mo App) 89 S W (2d) 567.

Character of proceeding. Where the issue is as to whether plaintiff's cause of action is in contract or in tort, the fact that the complaint contains a count for money had and received is not conclusive.[63] Likewise, where the statement in the affidavit for attachment is sufficient as to the character of plaintiff's claim, its truth or falsity cannot be established by a reference to plaintiff's petition [64]

§ 456. —— Hearing, Reference and Determination

a. In general
b. Continuances
c. Reference

a. In General

General rules are, except as they may be altered by specific statutes or rules of court, applicable to hearings or motions to dissolve or vacate attachments

A hearing and trial of the questions of fact involved must be had on an application for a dissolution of an attachment,[65] and such proceedings should be governed by the rules of law controlling the determination of issues on ordinary trials [66] The court or officer to whom a motion to vacate or dissolve an attachment is made usually will hear such motion without a jury, whether it be based on the original papers or on defects not apparent in those papers,[67] and in some jurisdictions such a trial is, it seems, the only proper method.[68] The court may, however, for its better information and satisfaction, frame and submit proper issues to a jury,[69] and in certain cases this ought to be done.[70] Where parties agree that the question as to whether the attachment should be sustained shall be submitted to the court and parol evidence heard on the motion to dissolve, if it was irregular for the court to hear that branch of the case, the irregularity was waived by the agreement.[71] There is no merit in an objection that the court should have denied a motion to dissolve the attachment because another motion for the same purpose was pending and undetermined, where the earlier motion had been denied before or at the time when the later one was granted.[72] Where on motion to discharge defendant or his property the only question involved is one of law, which has been settled adversely to plaintiff, the court may quash the attachment.[73]

The manner of taking the evidence at the hearing of a motion to dissolve, based on a denial of the truth of the matters alleged in the affidavit for attachment, is within the discretion of the court.[74]

The court must take notice of the complaint and affidavit on which the writ issued, even though they are not formally introduced in evidence, as they constitute a part of the record.[75] The court will not be influenced by a communication not addressed to it but to another and called to its attention, nor by that party but by the counsel for defendant.[76]

ticulars required to be used on the hearing, defendant may be granted a bill of particulars according full information as to the nature of the alleged cause of action.[77]

Right to open and close. Since plaintiff in attachment, as shown in section 455, has the affirmative of the issue and the burden of proof where the grounds of the attachment are attacked, it is usually held that such party also is entitled to open and close on the hearing of a motion to dissolve the attachment.[78]

Questions of law and fact. It is a question of fact whether or not there were sufficient grounds for the attachment.[79]

Findings. It has been held that a statute providing for the separation, by the judge, of his conclusions of law and fact does not apply to the trial of an attachment.[80] A motion to dissolve must, of course, be denied where the court finds as a fact the matter relied on as ground for the attachment.[81] A finding that a breach of contract, while sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover therefor, was not fraudulent conduct sufficient to sustain an attachment is not erroneous as a matter of law.[82] A finding, on an application to dissolve an attachment granted on the ground of fraud by a party to a contract, that there has been no breach and that defendant is right is a finding that defendant designed no wrong, and negatives fraud; and, if there is no evidence to show the specific fraud on which the affidavit of attachment was based, there is no finding that can be reviewed so as to disturb a conclusion dissolving the attachment.[83] Where the jury, instructed by the court, find against defendant, and also on certain immaterial issues raised by superfluous pleadings and redundant evidence which should have been submitted to the court, the irregularity is not such as to warrant the setting aside of the order dismissing the motion to dissolve.[84] Where the same alleged fraud is relied on as ground of recovery in the petition as is set forth in the affidavit for attachment, the finding of a court or judge thereof, on motion to discharge, that there is sufficient proof to sustain the attachment in no way affects the issue made by the pleadings, as that issue is still for the court or jury on the trial, and must be determined on the evidence then produced.[85]

Special findings after dissolution on the merits. After an attachment has been dissolved on a full hearing on the merits, there is no necessity that on request, sustained by affidavits, additional special findings should be made, and it is not error to strike such affidavits from the files on motion.[86]

b. Continuances

It is within the discretion of the judge or court to grant or refuse an application for a continuance of a hearing on application for the dissolution of an attachment.

The grant or refusal of an application for a continuance of the hearing on request for the vacation or quashal of an attachment is within the discretion of the court or judge hearing such application.[87]

c. Reference

On a hearing of an application to dissolve an attachment, a reference may be ordered by the court to determine the facts in some cases.

It is within the discretion of the court to order a reference to determine the facts in some cases, as where defendant in an attachment on the ground of nonresidence moves for a discharge on the ground of being a resident;[88] where the question of the validity of an assignment is involved;[89] or where the depositions taken under a rule to show cause are voluminous.[90] However, a provi-

§ 457. —— Order Granting or Denying Motion

a. In general
b. Scope and extent of relief
c. Operation and effect

a. In General

The order may dissolve or sustain the attachment in whole or in part, and may impose terms. General rules apply as to its form and sufficiency.

In a case calling for such action, the court may vacate an attachment in part and sustain it in part,[92] deny the motion without prejudice to a renewal,[93] or impose terms on the granting of an order vacating the attachment,[94] but a vacation cannot be made conditional on the giving of a bond or the making of a deposit.[95] The papers on which the motion was made should be recited in the order,[96] but it is not ordinarily necessary to set forth the findings of fact on which the order is based,[97] and it is proper to refuse to recite, in an order of dissolution, that there was reasonable ground for suing out the writ.[98] A rendition of a judgment for plaintiff and an order foreclosing the attachment lien, without mentioning the motion to quash the writ, is equivalent to an order denying the motion.[99]

Filing and entry When an order of the district judge at chambers, sustaining or dissolving an attachment, is made, it, together with the motion on which it is made, is filed with the clerk of the court and becomes a part of the record.[1] Where a journal entry on a motion to dissolve an attachment is to the effect that, after hearing the allegations of the pleading, the attachment is dissolved, the contention of defendant in attachment that the court heard evidence and did not discharge the property because of insufficiency of the petition cannot be maintained.[2] On a collateral attack, the final order discharging the attachment will be presumed to have been entered before the filing of a motion for change of venue.[3]

Setting aside order of dismissal. A complaint by a creditor in an action on redelivery bonds, which alleges the dismissal of the attachment lien by stipulation, without alleging that plaintiff appeared in the attachment proceedings or gave notice of a claimed right to prorate, is held insufficient to authorize the setting aside of the order dismissing the attachment.[4]

Directions as to restitution or redelivery. While it is proper, on dissolving an attachment, to direct restitution or redelivery of the property attached,[5] it is unnecessary to insert directions as to the manner of redelivery, unless such directions are called for by special circumstances [6]

Granting time to file attachment bond. Where the statute provides that an attachment issued without bond against a nonresident may be dissolved on entry of appearance by defendant unless plaintiff shall file an attachment bond, the court has no discretion to dissolve such an attachment without fixing a time within which plaintiff may file a bond in order to keep his attachment alive.[7]

b. Scope and Extent of Relief

The relief granted must be in conformity with the issues presented by the motion.

While it has been held that an order quashing the writ should further provide that defendant go hence without day and recover his costs of plaintiff and have execution therefor,[8] since, as has been seen in section 454, the merits of the action are not in issue, it is proper to refuse to strike the complaint in the main action on quashing an ancillary attachment,[9] and plaintiff has a right to have the case retained on the docket for new process and new order of attachment if so desired.[10] Where, on the hearing, it appears that there is sufficient ground for an attachment, the court may permit the warrant of attachment to be amended to conform to new proof adduced at the hearing.[11] Where defendant moved to vacate an attachment, an order deciding that the order of publication of summons was improperly issued because of insufficiency of the affidavit is erroneous as not based on the motion.[12] Where the motion is to discharge the attachment only, a further order of the judge that an undertaking given to discharge the attachment be canceled is not binding on the parties, that question not being submitted to the judge, unless the necessary and legal effect of discharging the attachment must be to cancel and avoid the undertaking.[13]

c. Operation and Effect

The vacating order is not res adjudicata to any fact in the main action or subsequent proceedings.

The dissolution of an attachment on motion is not a final adjudication of any fact in the action, even though it depends on a provisional inquiry into the merits and involves consideration of matters which would afterward arise on the trial,[14] and a vacating order is not res adjudicata as to a subsequent warrant issued on an affidavit stating additional facts.[15] An order dissolving the attachment on extrinsic evidence which cannot be put in the record must be accepted as conclusive in all collateral proceedings.[16] Where two writs of attachment issued in the same action are levied on the same property, an order of dissolution will be held to have dissolved both attachments, in the absence of proof that it was intended to be limited to one writ only.[17]

A refusal to dissolve a fraudulent debtor's attachment settles the question of fraud and retains for plaintiff his lien or right of action on the bond.[18]

Where an attachment was illegally issued, defendant may have the right reserved to sue plaintiff for wrongful issuance thereof.[19]

§ 458. —— Rehearing

The judge who discharges an attachment may grant a rehearing on such motion at his discretion

After an order for the discharge of an attachment the judge making the same may, on proper application by plaintiff and a showing that such order was obtained by perjury and fraud, grant a rehearing on such motion to ascertain whether the former ruling was induced by such unlawful means, and if he shall so determine he may rescind his order dissolving the attachment and overrule the motion therefor,[20] but a reargument will not be granted merely on the ground that certain subsequent acts of defendant tend to show alleged fraud.[21] It has been held to be error to reopen a case for the purpose of considering a motion to quash, where such motion has been adversely ruled on before judgment,[22] and also a rehearing which seeks a retrial of the question before the court on the first motion to discharge is improperly granted where the first motion was fully litigated and denied with a right of appeal.[23] An adjudication by one justice of the peace overruling a motion to dissolve an attachment cannot be reversed by another justice before whom the action is pending in consequence of a change of venue.[24]

§ 459. —— Renewal of Motion

After a motion to dissolve an attachment has been denied or withdrawn, it is within the discretion of the court to entertain a second motion therefor.

While an order overruling or denying a motion to quash or vacate an attachment does not necessarily preclude a renewal of the motion,[25] it is,

Order is not res judicata

An order denying a petition to dissolve an attachment was not res judicata, so as to preclude a subsequent application to dissolve the same attachment, because the doc-

as a general rule, a matter resting in the discretion of the court whether or not a second motion to dissolve will be entertained after the first has been denied[26] or withdrawn[27] Where no appeal is taken from an order of dissolution within the required time, the order is considered final[28] It has been held in certain jurisdictions, however, that a motion may be made, without leave of court, to dismiss an attachment on affidavits, although a motion to vacate the attachment founded on the original papers has been made and denied[29]

§ 460. Proceedings on Plea in Abatement

The time for filing a plea in abatement, the formal and substantial requisites of such a plea, and the procedure thereon will be considered in detail in the following sections.

§ 461. —— Time for Filing

In the absence of statutory provision, the usual rules as to the filing of dilatory pleas will control the time for filing a plea in abatement.

With regard to the time of filing a plea in abatement or traverse seeking the dissolution of an attachment, it may be stated generally that in the absence of express statutory provision the usual rule as to the filing of dilatory pleas applies,[30] and such a plea or traverse should be filed within a reasonable time, usually at the return or first succeeding term,[31] and prior to an answer or plea to the merits.[32] However, it has been held that pleading in bar before a plea in abatement is disposed of does not waive the plea in abatement,[33] although a pleading to the merits of the cause, without first interposing plea in abatement, waives the matter in abatement[34] In some jurisdictions in attachment cases the rules that matter in abatement cannot be joined with matter in bar in the same plea or answer nor can pleas in abatement and pleas in bar be pleaded at the same time, since either proceeding will cause a waiver of the matter in abatement, are not applied to the full extent,[35] and the joinder of pleas has been provided for by certain statutory enactments.[36]

§ 462. —— Requisites and Sufficiency of Plea

a In general
b. Verification

a. In General

The plea must be certain and specific and pray that the attachment be vacated or quashed.

Accuracy and precision should be employed in framing a plea in abatement of an attachment and such plea should be certain to every intent.[37] It should put in issue all the material allegations of the affidavit[38] and specify the defects of which complaint is made.[39] Such a plea should also pray that the attachment be quashed,[40] and may properly conclude to the country.[41]

Plea properly raising question of variance

A plea which stated that the writ should be abated because the summons was not in due form of law, in this, that by said writ defendant was required to answer to plaintiff in the court to be held on the third Tuesday of October, and in the summons defendant was required to answer to plaintiff at the court to be held on the third Tuesday of August, was a good plea and properly raised the question of variance between the writ and summons —Kenaston v. Chesley, 52 N H. 564.

41. Ill —Ridgway v. Smith, 17 Ill. 33
Tenn —Boon v. Rahl, 1 Heisk. 12.

b. Verification

Where it is so required, the plea in abatement to an attachment must be verified by oath.

In some jurisdictions a plea or answer denying the grounds of attachment as set forth in the affidavit must be verified by a proper oath,[42] while in other jurisdictions it is held to be unnecessary that the traverse to the truth of the affidavit which is the foundation of the attachment be sworn to.[43]

A verifying affidavit of a plea in abatement must be positive as to the truth of the facts contained in the plea, and should leave nothing to be concluded by inference or intendment.[44]

The verification may be made by defendant's attorney.[45]

§ 463. —— Amendment, Withdrawal, or Abandonment of Plea

A plea in abatement may be amended in a matter of form after filing.

After the filing of a plea in abatement to an attachment, it may be amended in a matter of form.[46] However, it has been held that an amendment should not be permitted after a demurrer to such plea has been sustained.[47]

Where a plea in abatement entered to an action commenced by attachment is withdrawn after return of process duly served, the lien of the attachment remains in full force.[48] It is usually considered that a plea in abatement is not waived or abandoned by pleading to the merits before a disposal of the plea is made.[49] Where defendant seasonably interposes a plea in abatement and it is overruled by the trial court and an exception is reserved by the defendant, he does not, by subsequently pleading to the merits, waive the objection so as to make it unavailable on appeal.[50]

§ 464. —— Similiter or Replication to Plea

The plaintiff may accept the issue tendered by a similiter or a replication to the plea.

If the ground of the attachment is denied by a negative plea, plaintiff has the right, although it may not be his duty, to signify his acceptance of the issue tendered by the plea, and this acceptance may be signified at law by a similiter and in equity by a replication in the nature of a similiter.[51]

§ 465. —— Issues

The sole issue upon a plea in abatement to an attachment is the question of the existence of the grounds of attachment denied by the defendant.

Upon a plea in abatement or traversing the grounds of the attachment, the sole issue to be decided is as to the existence of the facts asserted by plaintiff's affidavit as grounds of attachment and denied by defendant,[52] and the merits of plaintiff's case are not a proper subject of inquiry.[53] Where it is so provided by statute the moving party may apply to the court to have the issues joined in the main action at once and the issues of the main suit and those raised by the traverse are then submitted together.[54]

§ 466. —— Evidence

a. Burden of proof
b Admissibility
c. Weight and sufficiency

a. Burden of Proof

The burden of proving the facts alleged in the attachment affidavit rests on the plaintiff where challenged by a plea in abatement of the attachment.

Where the facts set out in the attachment affidavit are properly put in issue the burden of proof rests upon plaintiff to prove the existence of the facts as alleged[55] by a preponderance of evidence.[56]

56. Waring v. Fletcher, 52 N E 203, 152 Ind 620.

b. Admissibility

Only such evidence as tends to sustain the defendant's plea or the plaintiff's affidavit is admissible.

Upon the trial of the issue formed by a plea in abatement or traverse of the grounds of the attachment, the evidence admissible is confined on the part of defendant to matters tending to sustain the allegations of his plea or traverse, and on the part of plaintiff to matters tending to sustain the grounds originally alleged in his affidavit for the issue of such attachment [57]

c. Weight and Sufficiency

The rights of the parties are to be determined according to the preponderance of the evidence.

The rights of the parties are to be determined according to the preponderance of the evidence,[58] and it is not necessary that the existence of the ground of attachment set up in the affidavit should be proved to the satisfaction of the jury [59] However, a proof of facts from which the existence of the alleged grounds of attachment might be reasonably inferred is not sufficient to sustain the attachment in the absence of proof that such grounds actually existed [60]

§ 467. —— Time and Place of Hearing

The plea or traverse must be heard at the time and place fixed by the rules of practice of the particular jurisdiction.

The practice as to the time of hearing the issues formed upon a plea in abatement or answer traversing the attachment affidavit is not uniform. In some jurisdictions such issue should be disposed of before the trial of the main action,[61] in other jurisdictions the issue may be tried before a trial on the merits,[62] or may be tried either before or with the main case,[63] while in still other jurisdictions the practice is to try the issue as to the propriety of the attachment together with the issues in the principal action.[64] Where a motion to dissolve on account of the insufficiency of the attachment bond and issues raised by a traverse of the grounds of affidavit for attachment are pending at the same time, it is discretionary with the court which shall be tried first.[65]

Place of hearing. The trial of the issues of fact raised upon the traverse of the affidavit must be had in the county where the suit is pending.[66]

§ 468. —— Hearing and Determination

a. Trial by jury
b. Questions of law and fact
c. Instructions
d Verdict and findings

a. Trial by Jury

Unless waived, the issue on a plea in abatement should generally be tried by a jury.

Although generally the issue on a plea in abatement or traverse of the grounds of the attachment should be tried by a jury, unless such trial is waived by the parties,[67] it is a proper practice for the court to determine this question instead of submitting it to a jury.[68]

b. Questions of Law and Fact

Questions of fact are for the jury where the trial is to a jury.

Evidence sufficient to sustain

Evidence insufficient

Statute construed

Where a statute provides that no traverse of the attachment proceedings shall delay judgment, it means that nothing that works a continuance of the traverse only shall postpone the main case—Parker v Brady, 56 Ga 372—Alvaton Mercantile Co v. Caldwell, 128 S.E. 781, 34 Ga App 151

68. Metcalf v Jelks, 8 S W.(2d) 462, 177 Ark. 1023

Question of discharge for court

The question of discharging or sustaining an attachment is for the court to decide, though the liability of the defendant for the debt sued on is for the jury—Ford v Wilson, 288 S.W. 712, 172 Ark. 335.

Questions of fact are for the jury.[69] In case of conflicting evidence, the truth of the affidavit of attachment and the existence of the grounds of attachment set up therein are questions of fact.[70] Testimony of an ability to pay the debt owing does not entitle defendant to a peremptory instruction.[71] The question of residence is a mixed one of law and fact.[72]

c. Instructions

The jury should be properly instructed on both the law and facts involved in the case.

The jury should be properly instructed as to the issues of fact submitted for their consideration[73] and the principles of law applicable thereto.[74]

d. Verdict and Findings

A formal verdict should be had on a trial of an issue raised by a plea in abatement of an attachment.

Upon trial of an issue of the propriety of an attachment resulting in favor of defendant the jury should render a formal verdict for defendant before the court quashes the attachment,[75] although a failure to do so is not a cause for reversal.[76] Where a plea traversing the allegation of the attachment affidavit is not sustained, the jury should, it has been held, assess plaintiff's damages.[77] It is the better practice for the jury to make separate findings as to each ground of attachment, instead of a general finding in the plea in abatement,[78] but the failure to do so is at most an irregularity.[79]

§ 469. —— Judgment

The court should render a judgment in conformity with the verdict or finding.

Where the verdict or finding on the plea in abatement of the attachment is for plaintiff, the court should render judgment sustaining the attachment,[80] while if the decision on the plea is in favor of defendant the judgment should be that the attachment, and with it the principal action where jurisdiction rests solely upon the attachment, be abated with costs against plaintiff.[81]

E. EFFECT OF DISSOLUTION OR REFUSAL TO DISSOLVE, AND REVIEW THEREOF

§ 470. Effect of Dissolution in General

In the absence of an appeal, a dissolution of an attachment is a final adjudication of all questions arising therein and, as regards the property attached, the parties are put in the same position as if no attachment had issued.

A dissolution of an attachment is a final adjudication of all questions arising in the attachment proceedings unless an appeal therefrom is taken in due time,[82] and, as regards the property attached, the parties are put in the same position as if no attachment had issued.[83] The dissolution of a wrongful attachment cannot affect the lien of an execution in favor of a third person on the same property.[84]

§ 471. On Main Action

a. Where attachment basis of jurisdiction
b. Where jurisdiction of person acquired otherwise than by attachment
c Where writ quashed by agreement

a. Where Attachment Basis of Jurisdiction

Where the attachment is essential to the jurisdiction of the court, dissolution of the attachment will terminate the main suit.

Where a suit is commenced by attachment, and the attachment is essential to the jurisdiction of the court, the dissolution of the attachment will carry with it the main suit,[85] unless there is a statutory provision to the contrary.[86] Where an attachment sued out for a debt not yet due is dissolved, this will ordinarily operate as a termination of the whole proceeding,[87] although it has been held that, if the attachment is dissolved merely for a technical defect, the court should exercise a sound discretion as to whether or not the action should be dismissed,[88] and that, when a suit is brought with an attachment upon a debt not due, and upon maturity thereof an amendment is filed showing the facts and that the debt is overdue, the main suit should not be dismissed merely because the attachment has been quashed.[89]

b. Where Jurisdiction of Person Acquired Otherwise than by Attachment

Where jurisdiction is not dependent on an attachment, a dissolution thereof does not terminate the main action.

Where an attachment is merely ancillary, the dissolution thereof does not terminate the main action which may proceed to judgment, notwithstanding the dissolution, provided the court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the person of defendant.[90] Likewise, although a suit is commenced by attachment, where defendant makes a general appearance in the action,[91] or where summons is duly served on him,[92] the dismissal of the attachment will not carry the main cause with it, particularly under a statute expressly so providing.[93]

c. Where Writ Quashed by Agreement

Although a suit is brought by attachment, a quashal of the writ by agreement that the case shall be tried upon its merits does not effect a dismissal of the suit.

Where suit is brought by attachment, and the writ is quashed by agreement that the cause shall be tried upon its merits, the effect of the quashal is not a dismissal of the suit[94] In an action commenced by attachment under a statute for the benefit of all creditors, the settlement of an attachment by those creditors instituting the action does not discontinue the case as to creditors not assenting thereto.[95]

§ 472. In Respect to Attached Property

a. Vacation of lien
b. Return of property

a. Vacation of Lien

The lien on property seized under an attachment is vacated when the attachment is dissolved.

Where an attachment is dissolved the lien on the property seized thereunder is vacated,[96] and the right to hold the attached property ceases.[97] If by judicial sale a fund has been substituted in place of the property the lien on the fund is thereby discharged.[98]

b. Return of Property

(1) In general
(2) Time and manner of making return
(3) Necessity for payment of fees and charges of officer
(4) Liability for detention by officer
(5) Effect of second attachment where property not returned

(1) In General

Generally, on the dissolution of an attachment, all property seized thereunder should be returned, notwithstanding an appeal has been taken, although in some jurisdictions an exception is made in the case of nonresidents.

Ordinarily on the dissolution of an attachment all property attached should be returned to defendant, whether the dissolution is by operation of a final judgment in defendant's favor or by special proceedings for the purpose of obtaining an order of dissolution had in advance of a trial on the merits,[99] while if the property has been sold defendant is entitled to the proceeds arising from the sale.[1] In the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary, it is the duty of the officer to return the property or proceeds to attachment defendant, notwithstanding an appeal is taken or other proceedings in error instituted.[2] In some jurisdictions the property of a nonresident will remain in the custody of the court to await the determination of the main action.[3]

(2) Time and Manner of Making Return

The property should be returned promptly. A notice of relinquishment is not sufficient if the property has been removed from the custody of attachment defendant.

Where an attachment has been dissolved, the officer holding the property should return the same promptly.[4] If property attached belongs to two cotenants, the return to either will be sufficient.[5] A mere notice of the relinquishment of the attachment is not ordinarily a sufficient return of property which has been seized,[6] unless the property has not been removed from the custody of attachment defendant.[7]

Restitution not granted where summons defective
Although the motion of defendant in attachment to set aside the judgment for failure to prove mailing of summons is granted, restitution will not be ordered, defendant having been proved indebted to plaintiff, not appearing in the action, having no property in the state, and not doing business therein, and defendant's motion being delayed for nearly a year, and plaintiff's only remedy, were motion granted, being to institute proceedings in California.—B. Attachment of horses in livery stable
Where the sheriff attached some horses at a livery stable, but did not remove them therefrom, and after the dissolution of the attachment notified the keeper of the stable of that fact, a delivery of the horses by the latter to third parties who held a contract of purchase from the owner was held to be a legal return of the property.—Dishneau v. Newton, 71 N.W. 807, 96 Wis. 531.

shall be dissolved after the filing of an undertaking if sureties justify within a specified time, a constable is not required to release the property after the undertaking is filed before the sureties have justified [8]

(3) Necessity for Payment of Fees and Charges of Officer

The attachment defendant is not required to pay fees or costs connected with the seizure and custody of the property where the attachment is set aside or vacated.

Where an attachment is set aside or vacated, defendant cannot be required to pay the fees of the levying officer or the costs, charges, and expenses incurred by him in connection with the seizure and custody of the property as a condition of receiving back his property,[9] and where the property has been sold defendant is entitled to receive the entire proceeds without deduction for such fees or charges.[10]

(4) Liability for Detention by Officer

The attaching plaintiff is not liable for unlawful detention of the property by the officer after the attachment has been dissolved.

The attaching plaintiff cannot be held liable for the misconduct of the levying officer in refusing or neglecting to return the property to defendant upon a vacation of the attachment.[11]

(5) Effect of Second Attachment Where Property Not Returned

A second attachment will not revive the lien created by the first attachment if there has not been a redelivery of the property unless, it has been held, the second attachment is made for the purpose of correcting a mere irregularity in the first.

If on the dissolution of an attachment there is not a formal delivery of the property to the attachment debtor, a second attachment will not revive the lien created by the first attachment,[12] but there is other authority which holds that where the second attachment is made for the purpose of correcting a misnomer of defendant in the first and plaintiff and officer have acted in good faith, the second attachment is effective even though the property has not been returned to the owner.[13]

§ 473. On Rights of Other Attaching Creditors or Execution Creditors

Rights of creditors who, in accordance with the statute, file claims under an attachment are unaffected by a dismissal of the attachment for mere irregularities or discontinuance by an agreement between the attaching creditor and the debtor.

Under statutes so providing, the attachment is for the benefit of all creditors who file claims thereunder, and who thus acquire liens relating back to the reception of the writ by the officer,[14] and their rights will be unaffected by the dismissal of the original attachment because of defects in the papers,[15] or by a discontinuance by agreement out of court by the attaching creditor and the debtor.[16] The dismissal of an attachment does not affect the lien of an execution in favor of a third person upon the same property.[17]

§ 474. On Rights of Intervening Claimant

The dismissal of an attachment releases property claimed by an intervener.

The dismissal of an attachment suit operates as a release of the property claimed by an intervener, and if he wishes to be quieted in his title he must have recourse to a direct action.[18]

§ 475. Liability on Release or Forthcoming Bond

Unless otherwise provided by statute, the quashal of an attachment dissolves a bond or releases a deposit given to secure the release of the property.

Where an attachment is vacated or quashed, a forthcoming, delivery, or replevy bond given to secure the release of the property falls with it,[19] un-

Waiver by constable

A constable, under a statute relating to discharge of an attachment on filing of an undertaking, could not waive the time provided by law for requirement for justification of the sureties, and hence a demand for his fees as a condition of releasing property could not operate as a waiver of objection that redelivery of property to defendant was not yet due—Doe v. Cramer, 178 P. 850, 179 Cal 722.

less a statute provides otherwise.[20] Likewise, the dissolution of an attachment releases a deposit of money payable to the depositor on demand.[21]

§ 476. On Right to Attach Property in Other Proceedings

The vacation of an attachment does not preclude another attachment of the same property by the same creditor.

The vacation of an attachment does not preclude another attachment of the same property by the same creditor if grounds therefor exist,[22] although where the dissolution is on the ground of insufficiency of the attachment affidavits, there can, of course, be no subsequent attachment proceedings on the same affidavits.[23]

§ 477. Effect of Refusal to Dissolve

Refusal to dissolve the attachment conclusively establishes the truth of the allegations supporting the issuance of the attachment, the existence of grounds therefor, and the validity of the writ.

The refusal of a motion to vacate an attachment conclusively establishes the truth of the allegations on which the attachment issued[24] and the fact that the writ is valid and properly issued.[25] The question whether there was ground for issuing the attachment is settled and cannot be reviewed by a jury, either on the trial of the issue to determine whether the debt is due or in a separate proceeding,[26] nor can the court again enter upon the question of its dissolution after making an order denying the motion to dissolve the attachment.[27] However, as the only issue involved is as to the truth of the matters alleged as ground for the attachment, (see supra §§ 454, 465), a refusal to dissolve does not determine whether or not the property was exempt from attachment.[28]

§ 478. Review of Action on Motion

An appeal from an order dissolving or refusing to dissolve an attachment is governed by the rules applicable to an appeal generally, and hence the various phases of this subject are treated in the title Appeal and Error.

§ 479. Damages and Costs on Dissolution

Subject to exceptions, the general rule is that the plaintiff is liable for costs and, in some instances, damages, on dissolution of the attachment.

On dismissal of plaintiff's cause of action in attachment, ordinary costs should be taxed against plaintiff as in other cases,[29] and in some jurisdictions it is held proper, on dissolving an attachment, to assess defendant's damages by reason of the issuance of the writ.[30] Under a statute providing that a writ of attachment to secure jurisdiction of a nonresident shall be dissolved when he makes a general appearance, the costs of the attachment should not be included in the judgment where defendant enters his personal appearance.[31] Where defendants in an attachment proceeding made a general assignment, and the assignees moved to dissolve the attachment, and a similar motion was made by one of the defendants who had an interest in the property, and an order of dissolution, made at chambers, was brought up for review on certiorari and sustained as to defendant, it was held that the writ of certiorari was not of right under the circumstances, and that, although the assignees had no statutory right to move for dissolution, yet the equities were in their favor and no costs would be allowed for or against them.[32] Costs may be taxed against defendant on an ill-founded petition to dissolve although the writ of attachment is later quashed on the ground of defective service.[33]

Where the attachment is dissolved by appearance of the nonresident defendant, no attorney's fees will be taxed as costs against plaintiff, in the absence of a statute making provision therefor.[34] Attorney's fees will not be awarded defendant where the attachment is dissolved because of a mere irregularity in the signature of the affidavit and not because plaintiff was not entitled to an attachment.[35]

Damages and costs accruing from wrongful attachment are considered in §§ 520, 555–565 infra.

§ 480. Reinstatement

If the order discharging an attachment has not been made at the time judgment is rendered, the court may reinstate the attachment when convinced that the discharge was error, on a timely motion for reinstatement.

It has been held proper for a court, when convinced of its error in quashing an attachment, to set aside its order doing so, and thereby to reinstate the same at the same term at which it was rendered,[36] or even when final judgment has been rendered,[37] but an order discharging an attachment made at the time judgment is rendered is final, and the attachment cannot be reinstated.[38] Affidavits filed on a motion to reinstate an attachment, but which it was improper for the court to consider, cannot be considered on an appeal from an order restoring the attachment lien.[39]

Under a statute authorizing a judge of the court of appeals to reinstate an attachment, vacated by the circuit judge, on inspection of the copy of the record, including the evidence, if the evidence considered on the motion to discharge was oral, it should be certified by the circuit court as are bills of exception in ordinary appeal,[40] and, if the evidence consists of depositions, a transcript of such evidence with a certificate of the judge should be prepared as in equitable actions on appeal.[41] It is not a compliance with the statute to offer a copy of the order of the circuit court discharging the attachment, together with the original papers in the action, where there is no showing as to what evidence was considered on the motion to discharge.[42] Where an attachment has been discharged by the circuit judge and reinstated by a judge of the court of appeals, it will be assumed that the discharge and reinstatement were made on the merits of the case, and such presumption is entitled to a controlling influence.[43] The discharge of an attachment, pendente lite, is an interlocutory order, from which no appeal lies; it can be reinstated only by application to and before a judge of the appellate court.[44]

To be effective, the motion for reinstatement must be made within the statutory period of limitation prescribed therefor.[45]

Where an attachment after dissolution is reinstated, the lien thereof is of the same force and effect as if there had been no order of dissolution,[46] unless the property has been sold in the meantime and the proceeds distributed.[47]

XII. PROCEEDINGS IN MAIN ACTION

§ 481. Prosecution of Action in General

The proceedings in the main action, except as concern the attachment, are, in the absence of contrary statute, controlled by the ordinary rules as to civil procedure.

In general, as will be seen from the following sections, proceedings in the action which is begun by attachment or to which attachment is ancillary are controlled, except as to matters arising out of the issuance or levy of the writ of attachment, by the rules governing other civil actions. Where the action is one in which the remedy by attachment is not authorized by statute, the issuance and levy of the attachment will confer no jurisdiction;[48] but, on the other hand, where the court has acquired jurisdiction otherwise than by attachment, a defect therein or a failure thereof, as where the goods attached were not the property of defendant, will not constitute a defense to plaintiff's demand.[49] Under an original attachment proceeding instituted to obtain a judgment in rem against a nonresident, plaintiff must prove both the debt and the attachment lien.[50]

Where the effectiveness of an attachment lien is dependent on the establishment of the creditor's claim at law, any action in the attachment case before a trial and judgment in the main suit is premature,[51] but, where there has been a service of summons and complaint, an order of condemnation as to the attached property is appropriate although a claim suit independent of the main suit has not been tried.[52]

Unless the statutes provide otherwise, the procedure in an action on a purchase-money attachment is the same as in ordinary attachments.[53]

§ 482. Process or Notice

Process or notice in proceedings in the main action where an attachment has issued must, as will be seen in the following sections, comply with statutory and constitutional requirements as to its necessity, nature, and sufficiency.

§ 483. —— Necessity for

Notice or service of process in accordance with the statute is essential to jurisdiction.

Under the constitutional requirement of due process of law, which will be considered in the title Constitutional Law § 568 [12 C.J. p 1193 note 76], as well as under principles of natural justice, it is necessary that one have notice of some sort before his property shall be bound by a judicial sentence, and it is essential to the jurisdiction of the court in attachment proceedings that defendant shall be served with notice or process either personally or by some other mode provided by law in lieu of personal service.[54] Where the statute makes no provision for actual notice to defendant, the seizure of property under the writ stands in place of personal service and authorizes a judgment against the property,[55] but, where the statute provides for notice to defendant, a failure to give such notice is a ground for abating the writ,[56] dismissing the suit,[57] or reversing[58] or setting aside, in direct proceedings,[59] the judgment rendered therein. As to whether a judgment rendered without the required notice to defendant, where there has been a valid seizure of property, is void or merely voidable, the cases are in conflict. In some jurisdictions it has been held that the court

Statute prescribing limit for service of summons

The last sentence of Mason St. (1927) § 9342, which provides that the main action must be begun as provided in § 9199 not later than sixty days after the issuance of the writ of attachment, does not modify the requirement that the summons be issued, but only sets a limit on the time when the service of the summons shall be completed and the action begun by acquiring jurisdiction in the main action.—Borgen v Corty, 232 N W. 512, 181 Minn 349 acquires jurisdiction over the property by a valid levy thereon, and its judgment in regard thereto is binding until reversed on appeal or set aside in some direct proceeding for that purpose,[60] but the weight of authority appears to be that the jurisdiction acquired by the seizure of the property is not to pass absolutely on the rights of the parties but only to pass on such rights after defendant has been given an opportunity to appear and defend; and, where this view is maintained, a judgment rendered without the notice prescribed by law against a defendant who has not appeared is deemed absolutely void and open to collateral attack.[61] In any event, to support a judgment there must be either personal service or a valid levy.[62]

§ 484. —— Requisites and Sufficiency

The process or summons must conform to statutory requirements.

The process or summons in attachment must conform to the statutory requisites,[63] although an irregularity may be disregarded where defendant has been served with process giving him all the notice to which he is entitled.[64] Where process has been regularly issued but irregularly served in the first instance, an alias summons may be directed and served if there has been no discontinuance of the action.[65]

Where other creditors come in under an attachment, if defendant was duly served with process in the attachment suit first commenced, this is sufficient as to the other claims filed thereunder.[66]

§ 485. —— Inclusion of Summons Clause in Writ

When permitted by statute the issuance of a writ of attachment containing a summons clause is sufficient issuance of a summons.

The issuance of a writ of attachment containing a summons clause is sufficient issuance of a summons within a statute providing that a civil action is commenced by filing a complaint and causing a summons to issue thereon.[67]

§ 486. —— Time for Service

Service or publication of summons must be made within the time specified by statute.

Jurisdiction in attachment may only be acquired by service or publication of summons within the period of time specified by statute.[68] It is not necessary that notice to defendant in attachment be served at or before the issuance of the writ,[69] nor is it improper if the summons is placed with the sheriff before the complaint is filed.[70]

§ 487. —— Personal Service and Proof Thereof

In general personal service made and proved in accordance with the statute is essential to support a judgment in personam as distinguished from a judgment in rem.

If defendant in attachment resides or can be found in the state, he may be brought before the court by personal or other service of summons.[71] Where the proceeding is in rem and no personal judgment is sought, personal service on defendant is unnecessary,[72] but to authorize a judgment binding on defendant's person, where he has not appeared, it is essential that he shall have been served with process, either personally or by some mode equivalent to personal service.[73] In the federal courts personal service on defendant is indispensable and no issue and levy of attachment in an action begun in a federal court is permitted if personal service has not been or cannot be made.[74]

In accordance with statutory provisions regulatory thereof, personal service is made in the usual manner, by delivering to defendant in person a copy of the summons or notice at some place within the state where the action is brought or pending,[75] and an acceptance by defendant of personal service outside of the state is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render judgment on an attachment against land.[76] The proof of service must specifically show that the statutory requirements have been complied with and so a mere recital in the record that the action was commenced by attachment on defendant's property, with notice, is not conclusive that there was personal service on defendant.[77] An incomplete return of an officer will not be impeached after judgment if it is not so incomplete as to negative a performance of the essential requirements of service.[78]

§ 488. —— Substituted Service

Substituted service, when permitted, must be made in conformity with statutory requirements.

Substituted service is sufficient when permitted by statute,[79] but in making such service the statutory requirements must be complied with.[80] Where attachment is necessary in order that substituted service may be resorted to, the nominal attachment of a chip has been held a sufficient compliance with the statute.[81]

Where notice by mail is permitted, a copy of the notice must be mailed to each defendant, and consequently two defendants cannot be served with notice by mailing a single copy to them, although they are husband and wife, such service being prima facie void as to both.[82]

In jurisdictions where posting is a method of service, the proper averments therefor must be made,[83] the notice must be posted at the specified place,[84] and must consist of all the required documents.[85] The legality of the service must be determined solely from the sheriff's return, and

(2) Service by reading the writ to defendant is insufficient under Pub. St. c 219 § 3, providing that, "when the goods or estate of a person are attached, a summons in the form prescribed shall be delivered to the defendant, or left at his abode"—Blake v. Smith, 38 A. 16, 67 N.H. 182.

§ 489. —— Service by Publication and Proof Thereof

a. In general
b. Conditions precedent
c Application for order
d Order for publication
e Sufficiency of publication
f. Mailing of notice
g. Proof of service by publication
h. Personal service outside state in lieu of publication
i. Defects and objections

a. In General

Service by publication is authorized under certain circumstances, but the statutory provisions must be complied with.

In accordance with statutory provisions, service by publication is authorized where defendant is a nonresident, or has left the state, or where his residence is unknown,[87] but such statutes must be strictly complied with.[88] A statute pertaining to notice by publication in actions generally will not be held to amend a statute relating to attachment, when it appears that such was not the intention of the legislature.[89]

b. Conditions Precedent

Conditions precedent must be complied with before service by publication may be effected.

Before service by publication may be resorted to, an order for publication must be procured when such is a statutory requirement.[90] Dependent on the particular provisions of the statute pertaining thereto, it has been held that the order for service by publication may be made before the warrant is issued or before there is any actual levy of the attachment,[91] while in other cases, decided under dissimilar statutes, it has been held that the attachment must be issued and levied before the order for publication is made.[92] As the issuance of a summons is the commencement of the action, it has been held that an order for publication of summons and notice of attachment and the actual publication thereof do not give jurisdiction, where the summons had been merely filled out and not issued, and issuance had not been waived.[93]

c. Application for Order

The application for an order of publication must show the existence of facts warranting service in this manner.

Statutory period computed from order

Attachment, provided for by Code Civ.Proc. § 636, where a resident has been absent from the state for more than six months past and has not designated the person on whom to serve a summons in his behalf, cannot be issued, where the order of publication has not been granted, for until the grant of order of publication the statutory period cannot be computed, and to meet the required conditions an order for publication must precede or be granted concurrently with the attachment.—Sonnak v. Walker, 180 N.Y.S. 848, 191 App.Div. 157.

Vacation of order for publication

That an attachment against the property of nonresident defendant issued prior to procuring of an order for publication was vacated, and that the attached property was sold and conveyed to a stranger, did not warrant a vacation of the order for publication of notice against a nonresident defendant, since the vacated attachment may be reinstated on appeal or another attachment may be procured.—Sexton v. Attachment prior to affidavit for publication

A motion to discharge an attachment, on the grounds that the attachment order was issued and levied on the land before the affidavit for publication was filed, is properly overruled.—Button v. Maker, 200 P. 777, 83 Okl. 75

(1) Under Civ.Pract.Act §§ 232, 493, which amended and consolidated earlier statutes on the subject, no order for service by publication in an action to recover a sum of money only against a nonresident may be made, except on proof that property has been seized by attachment.—Dimmerling v. Andrews, 139 N.E. 774, 236 N.Y. 510, reversing 198 N.Y.S. 325, 119 Misc. 829, affirmed 198 N.Y.S. 909, 205 App.Div. 855.

(2) Prior to the above decision the cases seem not to have been in accord, due to some extent to alterations in the statute. Thus, in some cases a prior levy of the attachment has been held necessary.—Guffey v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 122 N.Y.S. 947, 67 Misc. 553—Wilson v. Lange, 83 N.Y.S. 180, 40 Misc. 676.

(3) In other cases it has been held unnecessary.—Parke v. Gay, 59 N.Y.S. 890, 28 Misc. 329—Whitman v. Vullo, 197 N.Y.S. 577—Merkle v. Sable, 197 N.Y.S. 576.

93. McClure v. Fellows, 48 S.E. 951, 131 N.C. 509.

The application for an order of publication should be on affidavit showing the existence of the facts warranting service in this manner,[94] such as that defendant has property within the state[95] subject to attachment,[96] and, where so required by statute, that an attachment has been issued.[97] If required by statute, a description of the property must also be included.[98] Where the necessary facts sufficiently appear from the affidavit for attachment, the application may be based thereon, and an additional affidavit is not necessary.[99]

d. Order for Publication

The order of publication must sufficiently designate defendant, although defects may be cured by an alias order.

An order for publication designating nonresident defendant merely by his initials is insufficient,[1] but an alias order of publication may cure defects in a previous publication.[2] The issuance of an order of publication raises the presumption that the petition and other papers had been filed theretofore without any indorsement thereon of the date and filing.[3]

e. Sufficiency of Publication

The publication must substantially comply with the statutory requisites as to its manner, period, time, and contents.

The publication must be in the mode,[4] for the period,[5] and within the time[6] required by the statute, and all the matters which the statute requires to be set forth must be contained therein.[7] Generally, where only personal property is attached no description is required,[8] but where real property is the subject of the attachment it must be described with certainty.[9] However, a defect in the published notice is not fatal if the property is adequately described in the affidavit for service by publication.[10] It is also necessary that the publication should be to defendant,[11] but the mere fact that a resident defendant is described in the published notice as a nonresident will not invalidate the notice, where it is otherwise as prescribed.[12]

Minor defect

Although there is a minor defect in the description of the land in the published notice, if the notice substantially complies with the statute and states the county in which the land is located it is sufficient—Pitelka v Pitelka, 171 N W. 894, 103 Neb 358—Grebe v. 12. H O & C A Thompson v J B Camors & Co., 89 So. 619, 126 Miss 772.

Plaintiff is entitled to a reasonable time to perfect his suit by order of publication, and the suit does not abate immediately on the return of the process not served and failure to take such order.[13]

f. Mailing of Notice

When mailing of a copy of the published notice is required the time and manner of mailing prescribed by statute must be complied with.

Where the statute provides that, in case of service by publication in attachment suits, the clerk within ten days after the first publication shall mail to defendant, a copy of the published notice. A failure of the clerk to do so within the prescribed time is fatal,[14] but, if a notice is mailed to defendant as required, it is sufficient, although it requires him to appear on a day which has already passed when he receives it,[15] and, unless the statute so requires, where notice is properly mailed it need not be further shown that it was received.[16] No notice by mailing need be given in an action of a nature different from that for which such notice is prescribed,[17] and, similarly, when the statutory requirement pertains only to a suit against a nonresident, it is not necessary for the clerk to mail a copy of the notice to an absent resident.[18] An affidavit by the clerk that the statutory requirements have been complied with is prima facie sufficient to give the court jurisdiction.[19]

g. Proof of Service by Publication

Proof of service must show compliance with statutory requirements

Proof of service by publication must show that the statutory requirements have been complied with.[20]

h. Personal Service Outside State in Lieu of Publication

Personal service outside the state is the equivalent of publication when so provided by statute.

When so permitted by statute, personal service on defendant outside of the state is the equivalent of publication and mailing of the summons or notice.[21] To render such service effectual there must be property of defendant which may be attached within the state,[22] but no order for publication is necessary if not prescribed by statute.[23] Merely

The sheriff's certificate that a warrant of attachment was levied on defendant's property within the state is ordinarily equivalent to the affidavit required by Code Civ Proc § 438 subd 5, where summons is served outside the state.—American Bank v. Goss, 142 N E. 156, 236 N.Y. 488, leaving a copy of the summons at defendant's residence outside of the state is not sufficient under a statute specifying personal service.[24]

i. Defects and Objections

Immaterial mistakes do not vitiate the attachment and if the court has acquired jurisdiction defects may be cured by amendment or by a new publication.

An immaterial mistake in a notice by publication does not vitiate an attachment properly issued and levied,[25] and if the court has acquired jurisdiction a defect may be cured by amendment or by a new publication.[26] However, where the statute provides that, if a copy of the attachment shall not have been served on any of defendants, and none of them shall appear, plaintiff, on filing an affidavit of publication of notice, may file his declaration and proceed as if service had been made, a judgment in a suit begun by attachment against a nonresident who was not served, and who did not appear, is void where the declaration was filed several months before the affidavit of publication.[27] Where a motion to set aside an order for publication is made on the grounds that defendant has no leviable property in the state, plaintiff may introduce proof that defendant has such property.[28] A notice of a motion to set aside an order of publication need not specify a jurisdictional defect on which it is based,[29] but an objection that the court has not obtained jurisdiction of the person of defendant does not present the question of the sufficiency of an affidavit for publication of summons in attachment.[30]

If the statute does not require a summons, where service is by attachment and publication, it is immaterial that one which has been issued is defective.[31]

§ 490. —— Effect of Service

Jurisdiction is acquired on completion of proper service of notice.

Where constructive service of summons has been had by publication against a nonresident defendant and property within the state has been attached under a writ of attachment regularly issued in conformity with the requirements of the statute, the jurisdiction of the court attaches in rem to the extent of the property attached, and a judgment entered under the constructive service of summons is valid and binding to the extent of the rest.[32] Personal service of a citation on defendant does not cure a defective service of the writ of attachment under which his property was seized,[33] nor does the fact that defendant was personally served with summons establish that he was a resident of the state.[34] Where, after an attachment is issued, a subpœna to answer is issued and served on defendant, the service of such subpœna does not make it the leading writ.[35] In a suit by attachment, where defendant is personally served, the jurisdiction does not depend on the regularity of the attachment.[36]

§ 491. Appearance

a. In general
b. Effect of appearance

a. In General

Defendant must file bail before he may plead if such is required by statute but not otherwise

Where the practice of requiring bail no longer exists, or the attachment is not regarded as the leading process, defendant may appear and defend the action without giving bond or other security to discharge the attachment.[37] Where special bail was required and attachment was regarded as original process to enforce appearance, defendant in attachment could not plead until he had filed such bail,[38] and where the statute required the replevy of property taken under an attachment to enforce appearance, the execution of the replevy bond was a condition to the right to plead.[39]

In some jurisdictions a defendant in attachment has the same time for appearance after the attachment as he would have after personal service in the action,[40] while in other jurisdictions he may appear and defend at any time before final judgment is rendered against him.[41]

The same acts will ordinarily constitute an appearance in actions begun or aided by attachment as in other suits and therefore this phase is treated in the title Appearances § 12 m.

b. Effect of Appearance

A general appearance enables the court to render a judgment in personam if it has jurisdiction of the suit.

The fact that an action is begun or aided by attachment does not vary the rule that a general appearance by defendant gives the court jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against him and places him in the same position with regard to his defense against the action as though he had personally been served.[42] Such an appearance waives defects in process or other prior irregularities which go to the jurisdiction of the person,[43] but it will not cure defects which deprive the court of jurisdiction of the suit.[44] Where a defendant brought into court on attachment process files a general appearance and answers, a motion to dismiss the attachment on the ground that it would not lie under the statute is properly refused.[45] It has been held that an alias writ cannot issue after a general appearance to an attachment issued on the ground of fraud.[46]

§ 492. Parties

The owner of property must be a party before he is concluded by the attachment proceedings or before a lien attaches to the property.

The owner of property is not concluded by proceedings to attach the property, to which proceedings he is not a party,[47] and if defendant has no interest in the property, no lien thereon attaches.[48] When a creditor attaches the property of a nonresident debtor, he must, in some states, where the legal title is in the mortgagee, make the mortgagee a party defendant,[49] although it has also been held that where, in an action for the recovery of money, attachment is sued out and levied on the debtor's real estate, the mortgagee of such property is not a proper party defendant.[50] It has been held that, where an equitable attachment was sued out by a surety against the principal debtor before payment of the claim secured, the creditor might intervene and prosecute the suit to a decree in his own favor.[51]

Right to move to discharge attachment
Under a statute providing that defendant may at any time before or after the release of attached property, or before any attachment shall have been actually levied, apply for the discharge of the attachment on the ground that it was improperly or irregularly issued, defendant's general appearance in an action, though it operated as a waiver of defects in the summons so far as the action itself was concerned, had no effect upon the ancillary attachment proceeding, and did not defeat the right to move thereafter to discharge the attachment.—Duluth Brewing & Malting Co. v. (1) In a suit by attachment, where defendant enters his appearance, the jurisdiction does not depend on the regularity of the attachment.—Maurer v. Phillips, 168 S.W. 669, 182 Mo. App. 440

(2) Where the action is not one in which the remedy is authorized by statute, the issue and levy of an attachment will give the court no jurisdiction, but it has been held that defendant may waive this objection by pleading to the merits.—Hoopes v. Pusey, 2 Chest.Co. (Pa.) 306.

§ 493. Pleading

a. Complaint, declaration, or petition
b. Plea, answer, or affidavit of defense
c. Issues

a. Complaint, Declaration, or Petition

(1) Necessity for
(2) Time for filing
(3) Sufficiency
(4) Verification
(5) Amendment

(1) Necessity for

As a general rule a complaint is necessary in attachment proceedings unless dispensed with by statute.

As a general rule the filing of a declaration, bill, or complaint is necessary in an attachment case to give the court jurisdiction of the cause,[52] at least where the attachment involves an amount in excess of a sum specified by statute.[53] However, under some statutes the filing with the clerk of a short note setting forth the cause of action is a substitute for the declaration in attachment proceedings.[54]

(2) Time for Filing

A mandatory statutory provision specifying the time within which the complaint must be filed must be complied with.

The time within which the complaint, declaration, or petition in an attachment suit must be filed is a matter regulated by the statutes and rules of practice of the various jurisdictions, which, when mandatory, must be complied with;[55] where the statute is directory only and not mandatory the court may properly overrule a motion to strike the complaint on the ground that it was filed too late.[56] Where defendant is a nonresident and does not appear, the filing of the declaration prior to the filing of the proof of publication will render the judgment taken in the action void.[57]

(3) Sufficiency

The complaint must state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, to authorize an attachment, and to sustain a recovery.

The complaint, declaration, or petition must state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action and to authorize an attachment of the property,[58] and,

Requirement of copy of declaration

(1) Statute requiring plaintiff attaching property to furnish copy of declaration within three days after written demand is valid and enforceable.—Ferguson & Co. v. Melillo, 165 N.E. 18, 266 Mass. 197.

Term of court

(1) Plaintiff in attachment suit has under the state law of Georgia until the last day of the term to file a declaration in attachment.—S. A. Lynch Enterprise Finance Corporation v. Dulion, (C.C.A. Ga.) 45 F.(2d) 6.

(2) Declaration in attachment in Georgia may be filed either at or before first term of court to which attachment is returnable the word "at," as used in Civ. Code (1910) § 5102 being equivalent to the words "not later than."—Smith v. Jacksonville Oil Mill Co., 94 S.E. 900, 21 Ga. App. 679.

(3) Declaration in attachment filed on October 1st was held timely, where attachment was returnable to May term of Bacon county superior court, in view of rule that declaration may be filed at any time during term to which attachment is returnable.—Tanner v. Patterson, (Ga. App.) 134 S.E. 405.

Authority of agent

A declaration alleging a contract with defendant's "regularly authorized traveling agent," but not alleging any authority in the agent to execute the alleged contract, was subject to special demurrer.—Ubico Milling Co. v. Poythress, 113 S.E. 815, 29 Ga. App. 134.

Specific attachment

Failure of a creditor and mortgagee of stock of goods to allege his mortgage rendered the issuance of a specific attachment of no effect, under a statute which permits a specific attachment to enforce a mortgage.—Ford v. Witty, 245 S.W. 846, 197 Ky. 86.

Election of claims

That court required plaintiff to elect whether it would prosecute action on one or both notes did not render defective grounds of attachment alleged in petition, where a single claim was sufficient to sustain the attachment.—Walker v. Grayson County State Bank, 35 S.W.(2d) 850, 237 Ky. 449.

Complaint sufficient

(1) A writ of attachment was held properly issued on complaint stating cause of action against husband on note jointly executed by him and wife after filing of proper affidavit and undertaking.—First Nat. Bank v. Collins, 9 P.(2d) 802, 51 Idaho 689.

(2) Complaint and affidavit which showed existence of cause of action on contract and liquidated damages was held sufficient to give jurisdiction to grant a warrant of attachment.—California Packing Corporation v. Kelly Storage & Distributing Co., 126 N.E. 269, 228 N.Y. 49, reversing California Packing Corporation v. Phoenix & Third Nat. Bank of where the suit is begun by attachment, the declaration must set forth the cause of action specified in the affidavit on which the proceeding is based.[59] The allegations must be statements of fact and not of mere legal conclusions.[60]

All matters essential to recovery, whether required by statute or rule of practice, must be stated. Hence, the declaration or complaint must show the jurisdiction of the court,[61] that defendant is the debtor,[62] and where a judgment in rem is sought, the property or fund upon which the judgment is to operate.[63] When specifically prescribed, the complaint must allege the particulars of the claim, the amount due, and a demand or refusal to satisfy the debt or damage done.[64] In the case of an attachment against a nonresident, the complaint must allege that defendant owns the property, or a sale of the same will be void.[65] Where the action is commenced by attachment, it is necessary, in some jurisdictions, that the complaint shall allege the issuance of the writ,[66] but in other jurisdictions it is held unnecessary for plaintiff to plead the attachment proceedings if in fact the court has jurisdiction.[67] When the complaint is prematurely filed, it must show the reason for the premature filing.[68] An action cannot be maintained to collect rent not due, without an allegation of fraud upon which attachment can be based.[69]

Allegations which are not prescribed by statute or rule of practice need not be made.[70] Thus, the petition in proceedings begun by attachment on the property of a nonresident need not show that defendant was personally served with notice,[71] and a bill for attachment against a nonresident is not insufficient because it does not pray for a personal judgment for any deficiency, where it contains a prayer for general relief.[72] Where personal service has been had the complaint need not state the intention of plaintiff to attach property of defendant.[73]

Construing declaration with affidavit. It has been held that the declaration must be construed with the allegations in the affidavit,[74] and where reference is made to the attachment papers the complaint will be construed in connection with them,[75] but it has also been held that neither the affidavit for nor order of attachment is any part of the pleadings in the action,[76] and that where the affidavit and complaint are separate papers, the complaint cannot be aided by the affidavit.[77] Where the action is on a debt not due, the complaint must contain, in addition to the allegations of fraud necessary to be made in the affidavit for attachment, a statement of the facts constituting the fraud.[78] It is usually not necessary to transcribe in the complaint all the matters recited in the affidavit or bond.[79]

(4) Verification

The necessity for a verification may in some cases be obviated by the attachment affidavit.

It has been held that the petition in an attachment suit need not be verified where the affidavit on which the attachment issued contains the substantive traversable matter of the petition.[80] A verification which is insufficient as to matters not necessary to be stated to show a cause of action, but going only to the right to attachment, will not render the complaint insufficient.[81]

(5) Amendment

An amendment is usually permissible in the discretion of the court where it does not change the cause of action.

Plaintiff in attachment will usually be allowed to amend his pleadings, as in other actions, without affecting the attachment, provided such amendment will not change the cause of action,[82] but the right of plaintiff to amend is ordinarily within the discretion of the court,[83] and he may not amend without leave of court.[84] Amendments have been allowed adding new counts for the same cause of action,[85] correcting a defective statement of the cause of action;[86] correcting a misstatement as to the amount claimed;[87] correcting a mistake as to the venue of the cause,[88] striking out parties improperly joined,[89] adding new parties;[90] and substituting parties plaintiff where the action was brought in the name of the wrong person or there has been a change in relation to the ownership of the cause of action.[91] An amendment changing the character in which plaintiff sues has been permitted,[92] but there is other authority holding that such an amendment dissolves the attachment.[93]

Suit for use of another
An amendment to the declaration, filed after levy, alleging that plaintiff sues for the use of another, who has purchased the claims since the levy, does not dissolve the attachment—Epstin v. Levenson, 4 S E 328, 79 Ga. 718.

93. Hagerty v. Hughes, 4 Baxt (Tenn.) 222

Amendment to sue as administrator
An attachment issued in aid of an action by a husband, as such, for malpractice to his wife, was held abandoned by amending the declaration so that the action stood as one by him as administrator for the use of his children—Hagerty v. Hughes, 4 Baxt (Tenn.) 222.

It is not permissible to amend so as to set up a new cause of action, and an amendment of this nature, if allowed, will usually operate as a discharge of the attachment.[94]

b. Plea, Answer, or Affidavit of Defense

The general rules governing the plea or answer in civil cases generally apply as a rule in attachment proceedings.

The rules governing the plea or answer to the action, as distinguished from the attachment proceeding, are for the most part the same as those applicable to other actions.[95] Defendant may plead any available defense,[96] but his plea or answer must be timely filed.[97] Where the plea or answer is insufficient, the attachment as against defendant is properly sustained.[98]

c. Issues

The issues which may be considered are controlled by the pleadings, parties, and evidence

Plaintiff in attachment cannot raise the question of fraud on the part of defendant unless there is evidence of an indebtedness.[99] Where a special attachment is directed and made of realty of which defendant once had the legal title, but which is alleged to have been conveyed by him prior to the attachment in fraud of plaintiff, and where defendant more than four months after the attachment has filed his petition in bankruptcy, been adjudged a bankrupt, and received his discharge, the court in the original action cannot determine whether or not there was an attachment in fact, or inquire into the alleged fraudulent conveyance, since such questions must be subsequently determined in proper proceedings, when all the persons legally interested are before the court as parties.[1]

§ 494. Evidence

All matters essential to recovery or the establishment of his claim must be established by attachment plaintiff

One must establish his claim and that his adversary is indebted to him before he can successfully fasten an attachment lien on real estate or sustain a judgment in attachment;[2] it is the duty of an attaching creditor to show that the property attached was that of his debtor,[3] and, where de-

Personal jurisdiction of defendant
Where personal service of writ is made on defendant in a fraudulent debtor's attachment proceeding, or he enters a general appearance, the action proceeds as any other personal action in assumpsit, and defendant must file an affidavit of defense as provided by statute.—Locey v Sterling Motor Truck Co. of Pittsburgh, 156 A. 730, 102 Pa Super. 148.

96. Lanasa v. Beggs, 151 A. 21, 159 Md. 311

97. Thompson v. Hockworth, 7 Ky Op. 171.

Answer filed five months after petition
An answer by defendant in attachment more than five months after the filing of the petition of attachment, in which defendant "denies that he is about to sell or otherwise dispose of his property with intent to cheat," etc, is not responsive to the petition because of the time which elapsed between the filing of the petition and the answer.—Thompson v. Hockworth, 7 Ky Op. 171.

After levy of attachment
Where summons is served by publication on a nonresident, and later an attachment is levied on his property, jurisdiction is not acquired, and the defendant is not under obligation to submit to the court's jurisdiction until levy of attachment, and hence his time to answer does not expire until the statutory period after the levy.—Cahill v. Broadwell Productions, 190 N Y S 235.

Demand not yet due
(1) Under statute in Missouri it has been held that in an attachment suit upon a demand not yet due the plea to the merits may be filed at any time before the demand matures.—Hamilton v. McClelland, 33 Mo 315

(2) However, defendant is not bound to plead to the merits until after the claim matures.—Kritzer v Smith, 21 Mo. 296.

98. Daugherty v Bell Nat. Bank, 194 S W. 545, 175 Ky. 513.

Failure to deny grounds for attachment
Where defendant did not deny allegation in affidavit that she and her codefendants did not have property in the state to satisfy the judgment, or that collection would be endangered by delay and return of no property found, the court properly sustained attachment as against defendant.—Daugherty v. Bell Nat. Bank, 194 S.W 545, 175 Ky. 513.

Whether debt is due
In an action on an account begun by attachment, the question whether the debt was due cannot be adjudicated, where not set up by the plea in abatement.—Lee v McConnell, 69 So. 706, 109 Miss 339.

Admission of debt
An affidavit of defense which admits the debt sued on, but denies the fraud upon the ground of which the attachment was issued, is not sufficient to prevent judgment.—Commonwealth v. Klein, 13 Pa.Super. 528.

99. Yost Mfg Co. v. Alton, 48 N E 175, 168 Ill. 564.

2. Employers' Liability Assur. Corporation v. Taylor, (Va.) 178 S E. 772.—6 C J. p 483 note 64.

Notes admissible to show debtor status
Where plaintiff company took defendant's notes payable to its officers for convenience in negotiation, in a sale of its business, they were admissible to support in attachment suit by the company to show relationship of debtor and creditor, although not payable to the company.—Maryville Mercantile Co. v. Hedgecock, (Mo App.) 186 S.W. 55

3. Smith v. McWilliams, 3 Ky Op. 246

Ownership doubtful
In an action for damages for wrongfully keeping hull of vessel on plaintiff's land, wherein several nonresident defendants were made parties, because of a doubt as to which was liable, the evidence of ownership was held insufficient to sustain a warrant of attachment except as to one defendant.—Zenith Bathing Pavilion v. Fair Oaks S. S. Corporation, fendant does not appear, that he has been served with the requisite process.[4] The right to recover must be proved, even though defendant has failed to set up a defense.[5]

The affidavit on which the attachment was issued and the writ of attachment are not admissible as evidence, although they may be competent to go before the jury as pleadings.[6]

The phase of this subject relating to evidence and proof of intent to conceal property or defraud creditors as grounds for attachment is treated in section 69 supra.

§ 495. Trial

a. In general
b. Questions of fact
c. Instructions
d. Verdict or findings

a. In General

The court may advance the hearing of an attachment issue, but it may not, without the consent of the parties, try an issue before the term to which the attachment is returnable.

It is within the power of the court to advance the hearing of an attachment issue.[7] It has been held that where defendant appears in a short note case in which an attachment has issued, the proper procedure is to try the short note case before the validity of the attachment,[8] and the action proceeds as in assumpsit at common law.[9] A court has no jurisdiction, without the consent of both parties, to try an issue in an action in assumpsit commenced by attachment before the term to which the writ of attachment is returnable.[10]

The pendency of rule to dissolve attachment constitutes no obstacle to the trial of the case on its merits against a resident duly served, or to entry and confirmation of judgment by default.[11]

b. Questions of Fact

Questions of fact are to be determined in the trial court.

Questions of fact are to be determined in the trial court[12] by the jury.[13]

A verdict should be directed for plaintiff if the defense is without merit,[14] and conversely, where the evidence fails to support any one of the grounds for attachment, a peremptory instruction should be given for defendant.[15]

c. Instructions

Instructions to the jury should be correct and applicable.

Instructions predicated on the pleadings and evidence[16] and which fairly present the theories of both parties[17] are properly given. It is error for the court to refuse to give an appropriate instruction where no other instruction on that subject is given,[18] but it is proper for it to refuse to give an inapplicable instruction.[19] In attachment, based

Reasonable time to record deed
What is a reasonable time in which to record a deed after delivery to give it priority over an attachment issued before its execution is a question of fact for the trial court in each case—Apstein v. Sprow, 99 A. 1045, 91 Conn. 421

13. West v. William E. Wood Co., 118 A. 69, 140 Md. 514. See Weber Chimney Co. v. Johnson, 205 Ill. 348.

Ownership of property
In an attachment proceeding, whether the property attached was owned by defendant or by a partnership was for the jury—West v. William E. Wood Co., 118 A. 69, 140 Md. 514

Intent of debtor
With regards to the right to attachment, the intent with which the debtor acts or contemplates acting is a question of fact dependent on the circumstances—Fulwider v. Benda, (S.D.) 253 N.W. 154

Deposits in assumed name
In attachment, evidence of bank deposits in an assumed name was held sufficient for submission to the jury of the question of whether defendant had property which he had concealed and unjustly refused to apply to the payment of his debts—Gray v. Valley, 101 So. 855, 136 Miss. 886.

Following language of statute
An instruction, in an attachment action on the alleged fraudulent purpose of defendant to hinder and delay his creditors, etc., which follows the language of the statute, is sufficient.—East Side Packing Co. v. Meritz, (Mo.App.) 218 S.W. 436

17. Martin v. Barrett, (Mo.App.) 204 S.W. 410.

on defendant's having secretly left the state with intent to defraud his creditors and made conveyances for the same purpose, an instruction that the conveyance of property to creditors by a debtor in failing circumstances is not of itself sufficient evidence of fraud to authorize an attachment is not erroneous, as taking from the jury the question of fraud.[20]

d. Verdict of Findings

A verdict must be authorized by the evidence and is to be construed in the light of the pleadings and issues.

A verdict which is not authorized by the evidence is erroneous,[21] it must be construed in the light of the pleadings and issues, and it will not be set aside for uncertainty if, when so construed, it is not indefinite.[22]

Findings on matters not presented by the issues are unnecessary.[23] Where nonresident defendants are jointly and severally liable, and service is had by publication, a finding that "defendants, or one of them, has property within the jurisdiction of the court" is sufficient to sustain the judgment against them.[24]

§ 496. Reference

References in proceedings aided by attachment are subject to general rules of procedure.

Where a referee has been appointed to take answers of a witness concerning the property of defendant in attachment and has discharged his duties, the court has no power to issue an order controlling the referee and compelling the witness to produce books and papers which the referee had not directed to be produced.[25] A statute which pertains to actions of account and provides for a reference to an auditor has been held not to apply to an attachment issue arising in an action of account, and there is no practice which would justify a reference to an auditor.[26] Where an attachment suit is referred to commissioners to ascertain the real estate of the attachment debtor and the liens against it, without first making the known lien creditors and the trustee holding the legal title parties, and the court consolidates the suit with another pending suit in which there has been no reference, it is error to render final decree on the commissioner's report as to both causes.[27]

§ 497. Judgment

a. In general
b. Form and sufficiency generally
c. Directions as to sale of property and application of proceeds
d. Time of entry
e. Setting aside default
f. Validity
g. Effect

a. In General

Judgment against the attached property may be rendered on a valid seizure thereof and a compliance with all the statutory requirements pertaining thereto.

Question not in issue

Where an attachment was issued on an affidavit that defendant was about to dispose of its property for the purpose of defrauding its creditors, it was not error to refuse an instruction on the question of hindering and delaying creditors, since such question was not in issue—Michigan Stove Co v Waco Hardware Co, 54 S W. 357, 22 Tex Civ App 293

Plaintiff's belief that grounds for attachment existed

Where in attachment the issue is whether defendant was a nonresident of the state, or had converted, or was about to convert, his property into money, with intent to place it beyond reach of his creditors, unless the evidence is sufficient to raise the question of defendant's estoppel to deny the grounds of the attachment, it is proper to refuse an instruction that, if defendant led plaintiff to believe that he was a nonresident of the state, or that he was about to convert his property with fraudulent intent, the jury should find for plaintiff—McCormick v Hawks, 95 So 241, 131 Miss 111.

22. Merchants' Grocery Co v. Albany Hardware & Mill Supply Co., 160 S E 658, 44 Ga App 112.

Specific description of property

In an action in personam, in which property has been attached, a verdict for plaintiff in a certain sum, and that he is entitled to have the property sold, without specifically describing it, is not so uncertain that judgment cannot be pronounced on it—Hartford L Ins Co. v. Bryan, 58 N.E. 262, 25 Ind App. 406.

Variance in affidavit and declaration

Where there was a variance in the designation of plaintiff in an affidavit for an attachment and a declaration, but the declaration also referred to the company designated in the affidavit, the verdict in plaintiff's favor was a verdict for the company designated in the affidavit—Merchants' Grocery Co v. Albany Hardware & Mill Supply Co, 160 S E 658, 44 Ga App 112

Sum certain

In an attachment on a judgment by which the amount of defendant's indebtedness was established and the only question before the jury was the title to the property attached, a verdict is not void because it is not for a sum certain—West v. William E Wood Co, 118 A 69, 140 Md 514

23. Dronillard v. Whistler, 29 Ind 552

Residence in county

In a proceeding by attachment against a nonresident, it is not necessary, that the court should find whether the family of defendant remains settled in the county, where such is a matter of defense which was not presented—Dronillard v. Whistler, 29 Ind 552

24. Coughran v Germain, 97 N W. 743, 17 S D 529, affirming 87 N W. 527, 15 S D 77

25. Guinan v Allan, 57 N Y.S 614, 40 App Div 137, 29 N Y Civ Proc. 277

26. Dickinson v. Morgenstern, 111 Ill App 543

27. Wilson v. Carrico, 33 S.E 237, 46 W Va. 466.

Where no personal jurisdiction of defendant is acquired, the judgment is in the nature of a judgment in rem and not a judgment in personam [28] By a valid seizure of defendant's property and the giving of such notice as is required by law the court acquires jurisdiction to render judgment against the attached property,[29] but to authorize a judgment, where there is no jurisdiction of defendant's person, it is necessary that it shall be made to appear that all the requisite preliminary proceedings have been taken in accordance with law and established facts,[30] and that plaintiff shall establish his demand by proof.[31] Under statutes so providing, before a judgment will be given for the sale of the attached property, plaintiff must give security conditioned to make restitution in case defendant shall thereafter appear and prevail in the action [32]

Although several writs of attachment may issue out of the same court against the same defendant at the suit of different plaintiffs, only one such suit should be permitted to go to judgment.[33]

b. Form and Sufficiency Generally

Minor irregularities do not invalidate a judgment.

A judgment which is in such form as to be readily understandable is not rendered insufficient by the occurrence of abbreviations therein,[34] and similarly an immaterial variance between the judgment on the attachment writ and the affidavit therefor will not invalidate the judgment [35]

As a rule the attachment judgment need not declare the existence of a statutory lien [36]

c. Directions as to Sale of Property and Application of Proceeds

(1) Propriety and necessity
(2) Form and sufficiency

(1) Propriety and Necessity

Whether or not the judgment shall contain directions as to the sale of the property is dependent on the requirements of the statute pertaining thereto.

While it has been considered proper for the court, on rendering judgment for plaintiff in an attachment suit, to include in its judgment a direction that the property attached be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of the judgment,[37] this is not the rule when the statute provides otherwise.[38] Where authorized by statute, an order foreclosing the attachment lien is proper.[39]

Assessment of damages by prothonotary

Under the Pennsylvania act of April 9, 1870, authorizing the prothonotary to assess the damages on evidence produced to him or on the affidavit of plaintiff or some other person cognisant of the transaction, a judgment by default, rendered without the production of the required evidence, is erroneous—Oliver v. Becker, 15 Pa.Dist. 599—6 C J. p 484 note 84 [f].

Recital of levy of attachment in judgment

Where the existence of an attachment lien was not an issue of fact for the jury, on the establishment of plaintiff's debt by the verdict, it was the court's duty to recite in its judgment the issuance and levy of the attachment as the method prescribed by law for the preservation of the lien fixed by the levy until enforced by execution—Johnson v. Application of property to payment of debts

A judgment on an attachment writ, reciting that defendant unjustly refused to apply his property to the payment of his debts, is not invalid because of a variance between it and the affidavit which alleged that defendant had property which he concealed and unjustly refused to apply to the payment of his debts—Brown v Williams-Brooke Co., 63 So 351, 106 Miss 187.

38. Payne v O'Shea, 84 Mo. 129—6 C J. p 485 note 94 [a].

Sale of real estate

When so provided by statute, the court will not render judgment for the sale of real estate under attachment unless, or until, it has been made to appear by affidavit that defendant has not sufficient personal property in the state to satisfy the judgment—Webber v Tanner, 65 S. W. 848, 23 Ky L 1694, allowing rehearing 64 S W 741, 23 Ky L 1107—Davidson v Simmons, 11 Bush (Ky) 330—Jackson v McElroy, 2 Bush (Ky) 132—6 C J. p 487 note 2.

Rendition of judgment on replevin bond

In an action for debt, in which plaintiff sued out a writ of attachment, the court had authority to foreclose the attachment lien regardless of whether judgment was rendered on the replevin bond given—Galloway v. Morris & Co, (Tex Civ. App) 249 S W 284—Coopwood v. Wofford, (Tex Civ App) 219 S W. 504.

Under some statutes, in order to subject the attached property to judgment, a personal judgment against defendant must contain an express order for the sale of the property,[40] although the writ of attachment will not be quashed unless there is a motion to quash by defendant.[41] In the absence of a statutory provision therefor, the judgment need not order a sale of the attached property.[42] A statute requiring the court to order the property "remaining in the hands of the officer" to be sold does not apply where the property has been taken from the officer before he has made his return.[43]

(2) Form and Sufficiency

Generally the order of sale should describe the property and direct the sale of as much thereof as will be necessary to satisfy the judgment.

The order for sale should describe the attached property clearly and definitely,[44] and direct the sale of as much thereof as will be necessary to satisfy the judgment.[45] Where realty is involved it has been held that a report to, and confirmation by, the court should be required before conveyance to the purchaser and payment of the purchase money to the creditor.[46] If a person, not a party to the action, has rights in the attached property, the court, although not having equity jurisdiction, may mold its judgment so as to protect such rights.[47]

d. Time of Entry

Judgment by default cannot be rendered before the time specified by statute. Generally, judgment on an attachment issued on an unmatured demand cannot be rendered until the demand has matured.

Usually it is not permissible to enter a final judgment by default against a defendant in attachment who has not been personally served until the lapse of a specified time after the execution of the writ,[48] but it seems that a judgment rendered before such time has elapsed is only erroneous and not void.[49] A judgment against an attachment defendant is valid against him, although it includes the sureties on his replevin bond, when by the express provisions of the code a judgment is not to be rendered against the sureties until the expiration of thirty days after the judgment against defendant.[50]

It has been held not necessary to wait until a determination upon a traverse to the attachment affidavit before entering judgment by default in the main action,[51] but there is other authority to the effect that, where defendant in attachment pleads in abatement and joins in plaintiff's demurrer thereto, it is error to render final judgment against defendant as on default without disposing of the demurrer.[52] A plea to a subsequent declaration will not prevent a default in attachment to which defendant has not pleaded.[53]

If parties to an attachment suit agree to a judgment fixing the amount due, such judgment may be entered at once without abatement of pending claim suits by other parties.[54]

Attachment on immatured demand. Where the attachment was issued upon an immatured demand, judgment cannot be rendered in the action, without defendant's consent or without express statutory authority, until the demand has matured.[55]

Motion to dissolve
Where a defendant appears by motion to dissolve an attachment, a judgment by default upon denial of the motion should not be allowed until time has been given him to plead—Whiting v. Budd, 5 Mo. 443.

e. Setting Aside Default

A default judgment may be set aside on compliance with a statute which so provides.

A default judgment may be set aside where defendant complies with a statute providing therefor and makes application within the specified time.[56] It has been held that a judgment in a foreign attachment suit will not be opened merely because defendant was unable to furnish special bail required and therefore could not contest the suit on its merits where defendant had knowledge of the attachment from the time that it was made.[57]

f. Validity

The validity of the judgment depends on the validity of the attachment where personal jurisdiction has not been acquired, but a judgment against defendant personally is not invalidated by defects in the attachment.

Where personal jurisdiction of defendant has not been acquired, the validity of the judgment depends on the validity of the attachment,[58] but where personal jurisdiction has been acquired a general verdict and judgment against defendant personally is not affected by defects in the attachment,[59] nor is it invalid because of a failure to adjudicate the issue presented by the attachment.[60] Although a portion of a judgment is void because it is in personam without proper personal service having been had, another portion of the judgment may be upheld where it is in rem on the attached property.[61] Where a judgment in attachment against two defendants is an entirety, if void as to one defendant it is void as to both.[62]

A judgment of foreclosure of an attachment based on a petition which was insufficient to authorize a judgment for the debt in that it did not state a cause of action is invalid,[63] but a judgment foreclosing a lien is properly rendered although allegations in the pleading that the debt was due plaintiff is not supported by the evidence, if no motion to quash on that ground is made by defendant.[64]

g. Effect

(1) In general
(2) As dependent on personal jurisdiction

(1) In General

A judgment is conclusive as to matters properly adjudicated therein and cannot be collaterally attacked. However, persons who were not parties to the suit are not precluded thereby.

Where the court has jurisdiction, a judgment in an attachment suit cannot be collaterally attacked for errors or irregularities in the proceedings,[65] and so, where the court has acquired jurisdiction of the property, its judgment is conclusive with respect thereto until reversed or set aside in a direct proceeding, and cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground of irregularities in the proceedings.[66] The judgment determines the truth of the attachment affidavit and the propriety of the attachment even though it is obtained by default.[67] A judgment in favor of defendant is conclusive that the attachment was without sufficient cause.[68]

Where the judgment is for the recovery of so much money and the costs of the action and the sale of the attached property, the judgment for costs is a lien on the attached property and may be enforced by an order of sale.[69]

Where the court does not have jurisdiction, the judgment is void and no title can be acquired under the sale.[70]

Amendment of judgment

Where plaintiff, by amendment, struck verdict and judgment as against property levied on and the surety on replevin bond, defects in the levy because of insufficient description of the property or failure to allege ownership in defendant in attachment were amendable and could not affect a general verdict and judgment against defendant alone—Philip Carey Co. v Sheppard, 91 S E 444, 19 Ga App 368.

As against third parties. A judgment rendered in an attachment suit operates only against defendants named in the affidavit and it does not prejudice the rights of claimants to the property who were not parties to the proceedings,[71] and, as against third party claimants, it does not establish that the attachment was lawfully issued.[72] A claim that a judgment adversely affects the rights of third parties is ill-founded where the judgment specifically protects their rights.[73]

Where, in a suit to foreclose an attachment lien, the court rendered judgment against claimants who were improperly allowed to intervene in the action, the court may, before the expiration of the term at which the original judgment was entered and without notice of its intention so to do, amend the judgment by striking out so much thereof as was a judgment against the intervener, and dismiss the plea of intervention without prejudice.[74]

Attachment lien. The effect of the judgment on the attachment lien is treated in § 260 supra.

(2) As Dependent on Personal Jurisdiction

A general judgment in personam is binding on all defendant's property, but where only jurisdiction of the property is acquired, a judgment can bind only the property levied upon.

Where jurisdiction of defendant's person is obtained, a general judgment rendered against him is binding on all his property.[75] Where the court has acquired jurisdiction of the property, but not of the person, the judgment can bind nothing except the property levied upon, and is not operative in any manner in personam.[76] If the property attached proves insufficient to satisfy plaintiff's claim, no other property can be taken,[77] and plaintiff must sue on the original indebtedness to recover the balance.[78] Such judgment will have no effect in another state as a personal judgment against the debtor,[79] and is not an evidence of indebtedness on which an action can be maintained.[80]

§ 498. Amount of Recovery and Writ of Inquiry

Generally, where personal jurisdiction is acquired the amount recoverable is not confined to the sum claimed in the affidavit for attachment, but as to a judgment in rem it is so limited.

Where the court has obtained jurisdiction over the person of defendant, a recovery may be had of such amount as plaintiff shows to be due him, regardless of the amount claimed in the affidavit for attachment,[81] but the attached property shall not be subject to a lien of a greater amount than stated in the affidavit if the rights of third parties who

Docketing

(1) Under 2 Comp St (1910) pp 1978, 1979 §§ 73–76, judgment in attachment proceedings in a district court, where there has been no appearance by defendant, should not be docketed in the court of common pleas, such judgment not being a "final judgment" within 2 Comp Sts pp 2003, 2005 §§ 168, 172, providing that "final judgment" of a district court may be docketed in the court of common pleas—Blessing v Blackburn Varnish Co, 107 A 599, 93 N J Law 321

(2) The act of docketing a judgment in a district court attachment, proceeding in the court of common pleas and the supreme court cannot affect defendant's land, since land cannot be attached in a district court proceeding, and the act of docketing the judgment cannot enlarge the scope of the judgment—Blessing v Blackburn Varnish Co, supra.

(3) Under 2 Comp St (1910) pp 2957, 2958 §§ 6, 11, providing that a judgment docketed in the supreme court shall operate as a judgment obtained therein, a district court judgment in attachment proceedings against a nonappearing defendant cannot be docketed in the court of common pleas and then in the supreme court, for to so do would transfer judgment operative only against attached property to one enforceable against any property in the state, without affording defendant an opportunity of a day in court as to such other property—Blessing v Blackburn Varnish Co, supra.

have acquired an interest in the property pending the suit will be adversely affected thereby.[82] Where no personal jurisdiction is obtained judgment should not be rendered for an amount greater than that claimed in the affidavit[83] or the published notice,[84] with interest[85] and costs.[86] The recovery of a less amount than that claimed in the affidavit will not invalidate the attachment.[87]

Where, after an attachment levy, plaintiff filed an amended complaint adding a second cause of action for increased damages but abandoned it at the hearing, the court had jurisdiction to render judgment on the first cause of action, payable out of the property levied on.[88]

Debt not due. Where the attachment was for a debt not due, the recovery may include a portion of the demand which was not due at the time of the commencement of the action but has become due before the trial,[89] if the rights of other creditors are not adversely affected thereby.[90]

§ 499. Execution

Execution for the balance may be issued if the property attached is not sufficient to pay the judgment where personal jurisdiction has been obtained, but not otherwise.

Where personal jurisdiction is obtained, and the property attached is not sufficient to pay the judgment, execution may issue for the balance;[91] but it is improper to award a general execution where there was no personal service upon or appearance by defendant.[92]

XIII. PROCEEDINGS IN AID OF AND EQUITABLE RELIEF AGAINST ATTACHMENT

§ 500. Proceedings in Aid of Attachment

When permitted by statute, proceedings to aid and supplement the remedy by attachment may be instituted by the sheriff or attachment plaintiff.

Provision is commonly made by statute for proceedings to aid and supplement the remedy by attachment. Thus, under applicable statutes, the court has power to compel defendant to make disclosure as to property which the sheriff has been unable to seize, and to order it delivered to the sheriff;[93] the attaching officer is authorized to sue for and collect promissory notes and other evidences of indebtedness attached by him,[94] plaintiff may, by leave of court, bring in the name of the sheriff and himself jointly any action which might be brought by the sheriff to recover a demand attached;[95] where property subject to attachment has been transferred in order to defeat or delay plaintiff, the sheriff alone or with plaintiff may bring an action to determine that fact;[96] and, where property of attachment defendant is in the possession of third persons who refuse to deliver it to the sheriff after levy thereon, attachment plaintiff may, in his own name maintain an action to recover possession.[97] Where a debt owed by a third person to the judgment debtor has been attached, the judgment creditor may recover the amount thereof from such person although, after the levy, the latter has paid the sum owed to the judgment debtor.[98] When so provided in the code of procedure, where a debt is attached, judgment cannot be issued against the debtor attached in the original action as in the case of garnishment, but a new action must be brought against the person attached to enforce the attachment lien.[99] Proceedings cannot be instituted to compel a third person to appear and testify as to any property in his possession belonging to the judgment debtor, where the moving papers do not allege, either positively or on information and belief, that the person has or had property in his possession belonging to the debtor.[1]

The maintenance of an action in aid of attachment must be predicated upon a proper levy under the attachment.[2] The sheriff may bring the action before judgment is entered,[3] although judgment may be entered in attachment prior to the bringing of an action by the sheriff against the garnishee.[4]

A statute authorizing the sheriff to maintain certain actions in aid of attachment does not affect a statute which permits him to collect and receive debts where the former is intended merely to furnish additional modes of relief.[5] Similarly, a statute concerning set-off which relates solely to claims under an assignment for the benefit of creditors has no application to an action in aid of attachment by a judgment creditor.[6] An action to satisfy a judgment out of the proceeds of a life insurance policy issued to defendant is not an action in aid of the attachment.[7]

The complaint must make allegations as to all material facts essential to state a cause of action;[8] one which contains all material allegations required by statute is sufficient.[9] A complaint in aid of attachment which seeks to levy on the cancellation value of a life insurance policy is demurrable where it fails to show that the insurance has a cancellation value payable solely to the debtor.[10]

It is not necessary to allege that an action by a sheriff against a person having in his possession property belonging to defendant in attachment was brought by the direction of the court or judge.[11]

§ 501. —— Equitable Relief

Generally, equitable relief will be given where special circumstances justifying it are shown to exist.

While it is not usually the duty of a court of equity to aid an attaching creditor until all his legal remedies are exhausted,[12] yet equity will in-

Transfer of stock on books of corporation

A party is not entitled to an injunction against a corporation restraining it from transferring stock certificates on its books, for if it holds possession for the debtor the attachment is effective, and if it

tervene where it is clear that plaintiff's only remedy is equitable or where special circumstances justifying such action are shown to exist.[13] When specifically so provided by statute, equitable relief will be granted if it is more expedient although plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law.[14]

Where proper grounds for its interference are shown, a court of equity will afford the attaching creditor relief against fraudulent conveyances and assignments[15] and will require notes in the hands of one who is not a bona fide holder for value to be surrendered to the attaching creditor of the maker.[16] So also, in a proper case, such a court will entertain a bill for an accounting[17] or to remove clouds from a title,[18] or grant an injunction to prevent the debtor from committing waste upon attached land,[19] or, in some cases, to prevent the sale of the attached property under a void judgment.[20] A statute relating to remedies of creditors who desire to reach negotiable instruments does not apply where the instrument is non-negotiable.[21] A suit in equity cannot be maintained in aid of an attachment at law where it has been decided in a prior suit to which complainant was a party, that his attachment was ineffectual to give him any lien.[22]

Where property is in the possession of a third person, that person must be made a party to the proceeding and given an opportunity to be heard.[23]

Equitable relief before judgment. When so provided by statute, equitable relief will not be granted until judgment in the attachment suit or until defendant has made default unless special circumstances warranting the interposition of the court are alleged.[24] Where a creditor seeks in equity to enforce the collection of a debt, he must allege that he has recovered a judgment in person against defendant whose property he seeks to attach, that the judgment is unpaid, that he has caused execution to issue on his judgment directed to the county where the judgment was rendered, or to that in which defendant resides, that the execution was placed in the hands of the proper officer while in force, and that it had been returned by the officer, indorsed in substance, "no property found."[25]

§ 502. Equitable Relief against Attachment

XIV. WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT

A. UNDER IRREGULAR OR VOID PROCESS

§ 503. Liability in General

A party suing out the attachment may be liable in damages where the process is irregular, unauthorized, or void.

Where the process of attachment is irregular, unauthorized, or void, a levy made by the officer renders the party suing out the attachment a trespasser, since under such circumstances the officer becomes the agent of such party.[33] It has been held that, where summons was not served on the attachment defendant within the time required by statute, the court lost jurisdiction and the attachment was rendered unauthorized and void from the beginning, and the attachment plaintiff might be held liable for the wrongful levy under it.[34]

§ 504. Necessity for Setting Aside of Process

Where an attachment is voidable it will protect the attachment plaintiff until it is set aside, but where it is void the attachment plaintiff is liable for damages immediately, without a setting aside of the attachment.

Where an attachment is irregular or merely voidable, it will nevertheless protect the attachment plaintiff, or other parties acting under it, until it is set aside,[35] but after it has been set aside it affords no protection to the party at whose instance it was issued, and he becomes a trespasser ab initio by relation.[36]

Where an attachment is for any reason void, attachment plaintiff will be a trespasser ab initio and liable to attachment defendant for any damages resulting therefrom,[37] and there is no necessity for setting the writ aside before bringing an action for acts done under it.[38]

§ 505. Actions

Trespass de bonis asportatis and case may be appropriate common-law remedies

An action for damages against one causing property to be taken under a void attachment has been held to be in substance an action for trespass de bonis asportatis.[39] It has been held, however, that where the writ is merely irregular or voidable, an action on the case is the proper and the only remedy.[40]

§ 506. —— Conditions Precedent

A demand for a return of the property is not a condition precedent, dissolution of the attachment may be.

A demand for the return of property wrongfully seized under a void attachment is not a prerequisite to the bringing of an action for damages for conversion thereof.[41] As has been noted in § 504, a setting aside of the attachment may or may not be a condition precedent.

§ 507. —— Matters of Defense and in Mitigation

Matters which constitute a bar to the action or circumstances in mitigation of the liability of the wrongdoer may be shown.

Where property is seized under a void attachment, it has been held that a subsequent seizure thereof by attachment plaintiff under valid process, whether a second writ of attachment or an execution, and application of the property so seized to the payment of the owner's debt without his consent, cannot be shown either in defense or in mitigation of damages for the wrongful attachment,[42] and this rule is not altered by the fact that an offer was made to return the property on discovering that the first attachment was invalid,[43] although, under other authority, the rule is not so stringent and the fact that plaintiff caused a subsequent valid writ to be levied may be shown in mitigation of damages.[44] Where property is taken by the wrongful act of one person, its subsequent seizure on process issued in favor of another against the owner, by which it is appropriated to the payment of his debt, is a circumstance which may be received in mitigation of the liability of the wrongdoer.[45] If the property has been returned and retained by the owner, this may be shown in mitigation of damages,[46] but not in bar of the action for the wrong.[47]

§ 508. —— Jurisdiction and Venue

Actions of the character under consideration are controlled by rules applicable to civil actions generally as to questions of jurisdiction and venue. The jurisdiction of particular courts will be considered in the title Courts §§ 249-297 [15 C.J. page 985 note 24-page 1007 note 10]. Questions as to venue will be considered in the title Venue.

§ 509. —— Time to Sue and Limitations

General rules apply as to the bar of the action by general statutes of limitation and will be considered in the title Limitations of Actions.

§ 510. —— Parties

Where several persons have void writs levied against the property of the debtor at the same time, they may be sued either jointly or severally.

Where several persons place void writs in the hands of an officer and have them levied at the same time, they may be sued either jointly[48] or severally.[49]

§ 511. —— Pleadings

The declaration or complaint must allege facts, not conclusions, constituting a cause of action.

If the action is based on the ground that the attachment was void, it is incumbent on plaintiff to plead facts showing this to be the case, and a mere allegation that the attachment was illegal, unauthorized, and void, being a conclusion of law, is insufficient.[50] If the basis of the action is that the attachment was void or irregularly sued out, it will not be sufficient to allege merely that it was vacated, but it should be further shown that it was vacated for irregularity or because unauthorized.[51] There is no necessity of alleging malice or want of probable cause,[52] nor is it necessary to allege the place of levy.[53]

§ 512. —— Evidence

The rules in respect to the burden of proof, admissibility of evidence, and the weight and sufficiency of the evidence in this action correspond to the rules in any other action on the case or of trespass de bonis asportatis and, therefore, the subject is treated generally elsewhere in this work (see Case, Action on § 10 [11 C.J. p. 19 notes 59-62]; Trespass §§ 86-96 [63 C.J. p. 1002 note 46-p. 1026 note 96]).

§ 513. —— Trial

The rules of law pertaining to the trial of this action correspond to the rules in any other action on the case or of trespass de bonis asportatis and, therefore, the subject is treated generally elsewhere in this work (See Case, Action on § 11 [11 C.J. p. 19 note 63-p. 20 note 71]; Trespass §§ 98-101 [63 C.J. p. 1029 note 58-p. 1034 note 35]).

§ 514. —— Judgment and Review

The rules applicable to any other action on the case or of trespass de bonis asportatis, as the case may be, apply in this action, and, therefore, the subject is treated generally elsewhere in this work. (See Case, Action on § 11); Trespass §§ 102, 103 [63 C.J. p. 1034 note 36-p. 1035 note 60, p. 1094 note 94-p. 1095 note 11]).

53. Vose v. Woods, 26 Hun (N.Y.) 486.
However, such an allegation will not vitiate the complaint.—Vose v. Woods, supra.

§ 515. —— Damages

An owner retaining possession and use of the property may recover only nominal damages, but where he has been deprived of its use he may recover the value of the use.

Where the owner of property attached under void process remains in actual possession, he may recover, if at all, only nominal damages, under an allegation of the value of the property as an item of damages,[54] but where he refrains from using the property under the instructions of the officer making the levy and is thereby deprived of its earning capacity, he is entitled to recover the value of its use up to the time when he was informed that the levy was released.[55] Where goods first seized under a void writ are afterward levied on under a valid writ in favor of the same creditor and sold by due process of law and the proceeds applied to the debt of the owner, this application may be shown in mitigation of damages for the wrongful seizure (see § 507 supra).

B. UNDER REGULAR PROCESS

1. Liability

§ 516. Nature and Grounds

Authorities are divided whether, if not provided for by statute, an action independent of the bond lies for wrongful attachment, in the absence of malice and want of probable cause in the issuance of the writ.

It is well settled that an action may be maintained against the attaching plaintiff for a wrongful and malicious attachment,[56] this being in the nature of a malicious prosecution or malicious abuse of process and governed by essentially the same rules.[57] Similarly, one who without probable cause sues out an attachment and levies it on the property of another is liable for the damages sustained.[58] In the absence of statutory authorization therefor, it has been held that an action will not lie independent of the bond for the wrongful suing out of an attachment, if there was probable cause and an absence of malice,[59] but on the other hand, there is considerable authority for the view that the mere fact that an attachment is wrongful gives the attachment defendant a cause of action independent of any statutory authority.[60] In a number of states statutes have been enacted under which at least actual damages are recoverable for injuries sustained by an attachment which is merely wrongful, and the procedure by which damages are to be recovered is prescribed either expressly or by implication, and under such statutes neither malice on the part of attachment plaintiff, nor the want of probable cause for believing that the alleged grounds of attachment existed, is necessary to warrant a recovery of actual damages;[61] nor

Counterclaim based on malicious attachment

In a broker's action to recover a balance due on trades in cotton futures, a counterclaim, based on the facts that plaintiff had wrongfully brought suit in another state for the same cause of action and had maliciously sued out an attachment to injure defendant and to force him to pay a debt which he did not owe, and which was uncollectible in law or in equity, that defendant had no property or effects in such state subject to attachment, as was known to plaintiff, and that the court there had no jurisdiction of the action, and there was no service of process therein, and seeking to have such action enjoined, was not in form an action for an abuse of process, but merely for malicious prosecution and wrongful attachment—Carpenter, etc, Co v. What constitutes probable cause

"Probable cause," as used in an action for the wrongful and malicious suing out of an attachment, is such a state of facts and circumstances as would lead a man of ordinary caution and prudence, acting consciously, impartially, reasonably, and without prejudice, to believe that some one of the grounds for suing out the writ of attachment existed, and in deciding on the existence of probable cause the person's belief in the existence of the ground for the attachment cannot be considered, nor the existence of such facts as might have influenced his judgment, but the test is the effect they might have on the judgment of an ordinarily prudent and reasonable man—Alsop v. What law governs

The right to recover damages for detention of a ship under a wrongful attachment is determined by the law prevailing at the time within the territorial limits in which the wrong complained of was done—Taylor v. Insurance Co. of North America, (D C N Y.) 9 F.Supp 574 has good faith, or the absence of it, on the part of attachment plaintiff any bearing on the question of his liability[62] However, in some jurisdictions the statutes are not so broad, and to authorize a recovery, while malice is not necessary, it is essential that the attachment should have been sued out without probable cause, as well as wrongfully.[63]

§ 517. —— Wrongfulness of Attachment

The attachment must be wrongful or no cause of action arises.

In order that a cause of action may arise from the suing out of an attachment, it is essential that the suing out of the writ shall have been wrongful,[64] and if the element of wrongfulness is absent the attachment plaintiff cannot be subjected to any liability on the ground that the process was sued out maliciously or vexatiously.[65]

An attachment may be said to be sued out wrongfully, where it is issued against a person who is not indebted to plaintiff in attachment and against whom plaintiff in attachment has no valid claim,[66] where the action is brought in the name of a person who has not authorized or sanctioned it,[67] where no grounds for attachment exist;[68] where the statute forbids the issuance of an attachment for the enforcement of a claim for less than a specified amount, and the claim sued on is for less than that amount;[69] or where attachment plaintiff's debt is amply secured,[70] or he refuses to accept reasonable security.[71] However, an attachment is not shown to be wrongful by the mere fact that it is sued out for a greater amount than is actually due,[72] although it has been said that, where the disparity between the debt actually due and the amount for which the attachment is sued out is so great as to manifest an intention to abuse the remedy afforded by the extraordinary process of attachment, an action for both vexatious and wrongful use of the writ might possibly lie.[73] It has been held that the fact that defendant, at the time the attachment was sued out, had no property liable to attachment does not make the attachment wrongful, but evidence thereof might be admissible as tending to show matters of vexation on the part of plaintiff suing it out.[74]

Sustaining or dissolution. If the attachment proceedings are sustained, this is conclusive that they were rightful, and there can be no cause of action for damages.[75] Conversely, a dissolution of the attachment on the merits is conclusive that the writ was wrongfully obtained,[76] but an attachment is not wrongful within the meaning of statutes authorizing a recovery of damages resulting from wrongful attachment merely because it was dissolved for defects in the form of proceedings, or for mere omissions, irregularities, or informalities in issuing the writ.[77]

A voluntary abandonment or dismissal of an attachment is held, in some jurisdictions, to render the attaching creditor and his surety responsible for damages for the wrongful suing out of the writ;[78] but in other jurisdictions it is held that no inference that the attachment was wrongfully sued out arises from the voluntary dismissal of the suit.[79]

That attachment plaintiff took a personal judgment for the debt does not impliedly negative either the dismissal, dissolution, or abandonment of a wrongful attachment.[80]

§ 518. —— Wrongful or Excessive Levy

The attachment plaintiff is not liable for wrongful acts of the levying officer which he neither counseled, directed, consented to, ratified, nor confirmed.

While an attachment plaintiff may be held liable for the wrongful acts of the officer levying the attachment in connection with such levy,[81] such liability is limited to cases where plaintiff counseled or directed[82] or at least consented to[83] the very act which constitutes the illegality or wrong, or, knowing that the acts of the officer were wrongful or irregular, ratifies and confirms them by receiving benefits derived therefrom,[84] and in the absence of such circumstances, the attachment plaintiff is subject to no liability by reason of the officer's wrongful acts.[85]

§ 519. —— Actual Levy

In the absence of an actual levy, no cause of action for wrongful attachment arises.

The fact that the attachment was applied for and issued creates no cause of action, unless the same was actually levied, although the issue may have been wrongful.[86] Thus, where a levy is invalid for failure to notify attachment defendant thereof, the mere fact that the supposed levy was entered in the incumbrance book gives attachment defendant no claim for damages.[87] However, even though the supposed levy is invalid, if the officer has assumed control under it, attachment defendant may recover his damages.[88]

§ 520. —— Damage from Levy

No liability for either actual or exemplary damages exists where none has been sustained by reason of the wrongful levy.

There can be no recovery of either actual or exemplary damages for a levy from which no damage resulted, even though the attachment, and hence the subsequent levy, was wrongful.[89]

§ 521. —— In Action on Bond

The nature and grounds of liability in an action on an attachment bond are discussed in section 163 supra.

§ 522. Accrual of Right of Action

The cause of action may accrue prior to the determination of an appeal on the merits of the main proceeding.

Where the dissolution of an attachment is final, no appeal having been perfected, and plaintiff's damages for wrongful attachment have accrued, his action to recover such damages, begun pending an appeal on the merits in the attachment suit by plaintiffs therein, is not premature.[90]

§ 523. —— Prior to Dissolution of Attachment

Whether the attachment must be dissolved before recovery may be had is dependent on the statute or rule of practice in the particular jurisdiction

In a number of states the rule is that, before any right of action can arise from the wrongful suing out of an attachment, the attachment must be dissolved,[91] but this rule does not prevail in those jurisdictions where damages caused by wrongful attachment are considered proper matter to be set up in the main action by way of counterclaim, set-off, or reconvention in cases where a recovery is sought by this procedure,[92] or in jurisdictions where there is a controlling statute to the contrary.[93]

§ 524. —— On Dissolution of Attachment

When the statute so provides, the right of action may be asserted immediately following the dissolution of the attachment.

Under some statutes the mere dissolution of the attachment gives a right of action,[94] and it is not necessary to wait until the determination of the main action before instituting proceedings for redress.

§ 525. —— On Termination of Main Action in Defendant's Favor

On termination of the main action in defendant's favor, a cause of action in favor of defendant arises.

Where a final judgment has been rendered in the main action in defendant's favor, he has a cause of action for injuries caused by the attachment in all jurisdictions where actions for wrongful attachment, either on, or independently of, the attachment bond, may be maintained,[95] and this has been held to be true, notwithstanding defendant did not controvert the grounds of attachment by plea in abatement or otherwise.[96] The statutes have been so construed in a number of jurisdictions as to require a final judgment in defendant's favor in the main action as a condition precedent to his right to recover damages for a wrongful attachment, so that the mere dissolution of an attachment without more would give attachment defendant no right of action,[97] but in other jurisdictions defendant may proceed for a recovery of damages for a wrongful attachment notwithstanding the pendency of the main action[98]

§ 526. Persons Entitled to Recover

The various persons who may have been entitled to recover are considered in detail in the following sections.

§ 527. —— Attachment Defendant in General

The attachment defendant may recover for a wrongful attachment if he has an interest in the property attached.

If an attachment levied on the property of a defendant in attachment proves to have been wrongful, he is entitled to recover for the resulting damages,[99] but he has no right of action where the attachment, although wrongful, was levied on property of all interest in which he has divested himself before the levy, and a fortiori the attachment defendant can have no right of action for the

Valid and invalid writs issued simultaneously

Where writs of attachment and sequestration were simultaneously issued and executed on the same property which was released on seizure under both writs at the same time, there can be no recovery based on the wrongfulness of the attachment, if the writ of sequestration was valid —Watkins Banking Co. v Louisiana Lumber Co, 17 So 143, 47 La Ann. 581.

seizure of property of a stranger, to which he never had any title[1] Where the persons suing out the attachment mistakenly assumed that plaintiff was their debtor, but plaintiff was the one whose wages they intended to attach, he can sue for wrongful attachment.[2]

§ 528. —— Waiver or Estoppel

An attachment defendant may by his conduct waive or become estopped to assert his claim for damages.

An attachment defendant may, by his conduct, waive, or become estopped to assert, his claim for damages for a wrongful attachment;[3] but, as he is entitled to bring an action for the wrongful attachment at any time within the statutory period of limitation, he cannot lose his right merely by failing to notify the surety of his intentions in that regard[4] Attachment defendant is not precluded from recovering damages by giving a redelivery bond or depositing a sum of money to secure the release of the attachment and repossession of the property.[5]

§ 529. —— Assignee in Bankruptcy of Attachment Defendant

An assignee in bankruptcy of attachment defendant may recover the actual damages sustained, but the right to recover punitive damages remains with the bankrupt.

It has been held that a bankrupt's right of action on an attachment bond for the wrongful suing out of an attachment passes to the assignee in bankruptcy in so far as the action seeks compensation for injuring, detaining, or converting the property attached, but remains with the bankrupt in so far as the action seeks to recover compensation for injury to the bankrupt's business, reputation, and credit, and vindictive damages for a malicious suing out, or abusive use, of the attachment.[6]

§ 530. —— Owner of Property Attached

The remedy of the owner of the property who is not a party to the attachment proceedings is by an action for wrongful seizure and dispossession, and not by an action for wrongful attachment.

As a general rule, as stated in § 517 above, the basis of an action for a wrongful attachment is the wrongful suing out of the writ; but, in case a writ of attachment is levied on the property of a person other than defendant in the attachment proceedings, the existence of the grounds for an attachment against such defendant is immaterial, and the remedy of the owner of the property is by an action for wrongful seizure and dispossession and not by an action for wrongful attachment.[7]

Claims of third persons have been considered in §§ 339–405.

§ 531. —— Garnishees

The right of a garnishee to sue on the attachment bond has been treated in § 163. Examine Pocket Parts for cases, if any such may arise, as to the right of a garnishee to recover other than on a bond.

§ 532. —— Officer Levying Attachment

The right of the officer levying the attachment to sue on the attachment bond has been treated in § 163. Examine Pocket Parts for cases, if any such may arise, as to the right of the officer to recover other than on a bond.

§ 533. Persons Liable

Ordinarily it is the attachment plaintiff who is liable, although an officer issuing a writ without proper authority may be.

Attachment plaintiff is liable for the damages resulting from the wrongful suing out of the writ, or, under certain circumstances, for a wrongful levy under a writ properly sued out.[8] Several succes-

§ 534. —— Liability of Principal for Act of Agent or Attorney

A principal is liable for the wrongful issuance of an attachment by his agent where the latter is acting within the scope of the agency.

One who authorizes or directs his agent or attorney to sue out a writ of attachment, or ratifies the act of the latter in so doing, is liable for actual damages resulting therefrom in case the attachment proves to be wrongful,[13] or the agent is guilty of misconduct while acting within the scope of the agency.[14] So, also, where an agent or attorney, acting maliciously and without probable cause therefor, sues out an attachment in the name of his principal, the latter may be held liable for exemplary damages if he caused or participated in such evil motive or ratified what was done with full knowledge of the existence thereof;[15] but in the absence of such participation or ratification exemplary damages cannot be assessed against the principal.[16]

A general authority to commence suit will warrant an attorney in attaching property and will render the client responsible for any damages occasioned thereby.[17]

2. Actions

§ 535. Methods of Enforcing Liability

Owing to the great variety of statutes on the subject, the methods of enforcing liability for injuries caused by wrongful attachments are very numerous, and in most jurisdictions several modes of obtaining redress for such injuries are open to the attachment defendant, which are discussed in detail in §§ 536–538 following.

§ 536. —— Proceedings in Main Action

b. Set-off and counterclaim

a. In General

Dependent on the governing statute in the particular jurisdiction, damages may be recovered in the action in which the attachment was issued, after dissolution thereof, or in other proceedings.

There is a variance in the statutes and rules of practice on this subject in the several jurisdictions, and so in a number of jurisdictions damages resulting from a wrongful attachment need not be separately sued for, but may be recovered in the action in which the attachment was issued,[18] while in others damages for the wrongful suing out of an attachment cannot be awarded in the attachment suit, but can be recovered only by proceedings subsequent to the main action (see § 537 infra). The recovery of damages in the same proceedings is an optional rather than an exclusive remedy where the statute is permissive in character,[19] but there is no other remedy available for the recovery of compensatory damages arising from the loss of or injury to the property where the statute is mandatory.[20] In some jurisdictions, on the dissolution or dismissal of the attachment in proper proceedings for that purpose, the damages sustained by a wrongful attachment may be assessed and a judgment therefor rendered against attachment plaintiff and the sureties on his attachment bond,[21] and it has been held that, where it is determined that attachment defendant was not indebted to attachment plaintiff, damages as for the wrongful attachment of defendant's property may thereupon be assessed,[22] even though the grounds on which the attachment was issued were not contested.[23]

In the absence of statutory directions the better practice in attachment suits is to try the main issue first, and then, in the event of defendant succeeding, to take up the trial of the claim for damages.[24]

b. Set-Off and Counterclaim

Dependent on the governing statutory provision, a set-off or counterclaim for the damages sustained may or may not be asserted in the main action.

In regard to the right to counterclaim damages caused by a wrongful attachment in the main suit the decisions are not harmonious, due, in a measure, to variations in the statutes in the several jurisdictions. According to some authorities such a counterclaim is proper,[25] at least where the affidavit and bond for attachment are filed with the petition in the action and the writ is immediately sued out,[26] the reasons given being that such a counterclaim is connected with the subject of the action,[27] arises out of the suit instituted by plaintiff in attachment,[28] or is a claim held by defendant at the commencement of the action.[29] On the other hand, it is held in a number of cases that damages arising from a wrongful attachment are not a proper subject of counterclaim in the main action,[30] for the reasons that the claim therefor does not arise out of the contract or transaction set forth in the petition as the foundation of plaintiff's claim,[31] is not connected with the subject of the action,[32] or is not one on which, at the time of the commencement of the action, defendant could have maintained an action on his part against plaintiff.[33] A counterclaim alleging that the proceedings were maliciously instituted will be dismissed since a determination of the attachment proceedings is a prerequisite to the cause of action and the counterclaim would raise improper issues.[34]

§ 4855, becoming effective, May 16, 1913, a cross action by defendant for wrongful attachment could not be maintained in the same proceedings—Selsor v Arnbrecht, 157 P 908, 57 Okl 732

Necessity for leave of court

In Kansas, under the definition of a set-off in Code Civ.Proc § 100 (Gen St [1915] § 6992), as a cause of action for the recovery of money, a claim for damages on account of a wrongful attachment may be used as a cross demand in the action in which the attachment order was issued, but only where it is set out in a supplemental answer filed by leave of court, inasmuch as it is only by such permission that matters occurring since the beginning of the action can be effectively pleaded in view of Code Civ Proc. § 145 (Gen. 33. Tessier v Englehart, 24 N.W. 734, 18 Neb 167

34. Kassel Poultry Co. v. Sheldon

It has been held that in an action aided by attachment damages on the ground that the attachment was wrongful are not a proper subject of set-off, because not in existence at the commencement of the suit,[35] and that, where a suit is commenced by attachment, damages alleged to be sustained by the issue thereof cannot be set off in such action pending a rule to dissolve the attachment.[36] Nevertheless, in a case where a nonresident plaintiff, after attaching defendant's property, took charge thereof, and without defendant's consent wrongfully sold it and converted the proceeds to his own use, it was held that plaintiff was liable to defendant for the value of the property converted above the debt with interest and costs, which defendant was entitled to set off in the attachment suit.[37]

c. Reconvention

In some jurisdictions a plea in reconvention for damages sustained is proper.

In Texas it is well settled that damages caused by a wrongful attachment may be pleaded in reconvention in the action in which the attachment was sued out, and in so pleading defendant may declare either independently of or on the attachment bond.[38]

In Louisiana it has been held that, where defendant in an action instituted by attachment resides in the same parish as plaintiff, he cannot institute a demand in reconvention for damages growing out of the attachment; but it appears that such a plea is permissible where the parties do not reside in the same parish.[39]

§ 537. —— Proceedings Subsequent to Main Action

In some jurisdictions proceedings for damages can only be had subsequent to the main action. The right to set off the damages in a subsequent action does not exist in the absence of statute.

Dependent on statute or rule of practice in some jurisdictions damages for the wrongful suing out of an attachment can be recovered at law only by proceedings subsequent to the main action.[40] It has been held, however, that defendant in attachment suit at equity may at his discretion, where the attachment has been dismissed, proceed to recover damages by motion before the court that passed upon the original cause.[41] The provisions of the code must be complied with before the court will permit an attachment plaintiff to resort to the harsh and summary method of enforcing the bond by rule.[42]

Ordinarily the right to set up such damages by way of a counterclaim or set-off in a subsequent action does not exist, especially when the damages are incapable of liquidation,[43] but under a statute requiring a bond conditioned that plaintiff shall pay damages if he fails to prosecute his action with effect and recover judgment against defendant, it has been held that, where an attachment has been dissolved, the damages, if capable of liquidation, may be set off in a subsequent action by plaintiff against defendant on the same cause of action.[44]

§ 538. —— Election of Remedies and Effect Thereof

The attachment defendant cannot choose inconsistent remedies.

An action of replevin will lie to recover property wrongfully attached,[45] but if the owner replevies the property he may not proceed under a statute authorizing him to sue for double its value.[46] Similarly, where plaintiff has the attachment dissolved and the property returned to him he cannot treat the attachment as a conversion and sue for the full value of the property.[47] Case, and not trespass is the proper form of action for maliciously suing out an attachment and causing it to be levied on the property of another.[48]

In some states, on failure of an attachment, defendant may sue either on the attachment undertaking or for malicious attachment.[49] Where a party prosecutes concurrently an action at law on the attachment bond against the principal obligor alone and motions in equity against the principal obligor and his sureties, the court will, on its own motion, require him to elect whether he will proceed at law or in equity.[50] If defendant in attachment counterclaims damages on the bond, a recovery thereon is a bar to a recovery in a subsequent suit of any further damages for the same cause;[51] but where judgment is rendered for attachment defendant on a counterclaim for damages, and the judgment orders, in addition to the payment of damages, the return of the property or the payment of its value in a designated sum, and the damages are paid, but the property is not returned, a suit will lie on the attachment bond for its value as fixed by the judgment.[52] Where two attachments are levied on the same property, and defendant reconvenes in respect to the second and recovers damages, this does not operate as a bar to an action by him against the prior attaching creditor for wrongful attachment.[53]

§ 539. Conditions Precedent

In the absence of statutory requirement, a demand for the payment of damages is not a condition precedent to the institution of suit.

In the absence of any statutory requirement therefor, a demand for the payment of the damages suffered is not necessary as a condition precedent to the commencement of an action for wrongful attachment.[54]

§ 540. Defenses

a. In general
b. Acts or statements of attachment defendant
c. Good faith; justness of claim
d Probable cause, insolvency of debtor
e. Advice of counsel
f. Subsequent levy; return of property

a. In General

In some jurisdictions grounds not asserted in the affidavit are not available as a defense to wrongful attachment, but there is authority to the contrary. Matters which have been adversely decided in the main action cannot be asserted as a defense.

Generally, in an action for wrongful attachment the inquiry is limited to the grounds of attachment alleged in the affidavit, and if these are found not to exist or not to be sufficient, the existence of other grounds which were sufficient furnishes no defense,[55] but there is authority which holds that the existence of any ground of attachment is a complete defense even though such ground is not alleged in the affidavit.[56] The failure of the attaching creditor to file an affidavit for attachment is no defense if there has been an actual levy.[57] Where the action is based upon a conversion of attached property wrongfully sold, it is no defense that the sheriff is also liable for suffering the conversion.[58] Where the issue as to the rightfulness of an attachment has been decided in the main action adversely to the attachment plaintiff, he cannot, in an action for wrongful attachment, set up as a defense that the matters set up in the affidavit were true, or that the attachment proceedings were not wrongful.[59]

Demand necessary after consent

To recover damages for the hire of slaves seized by attachment it was held not necessary to put the attaching party in default, but where an attachment was levied on slaves, and with the debtor's consent they remained in the hands of attachment plaintiff, in order to enable the former to recover their value, it was held that the latter must be put in default otherwise than by the institution of suit—Cox v. Robinson, 2 Rob (La.) 313.

do not constitute estoppel or grounds for the attachment cannot be utilized as a defense.

It is no defense to a claim for damages for wrongful attachment that defendant in attachment replevied the goods from the officer and obtained judgment therefor,[60] failed to object to the sale of the goods under the attachment and assisted in making a better sale,[61] did not question the validity of the levy,[62] neglected to bond the property,[63] fraudulently assigned his property shortly after the attachment, unless the fraudulent intent on the part of defendant existed at the time the attachment issued,[64] settled the main action by payment of his indebtedness;[65] made a settlement of an attachment wrongfully brought by giving notes for the alleged debt and payment of costs in order to obtain a release of his property,[66] or released a claim for damages for a subsequent attachment in consideration of its relinquishment.[67] It is a good defense that the affidavit for attachment was founded on statements of matters sufficient to authorize an attachment made by defendant in attachment to plaintiff,[68] or to third persons and communicated to plaintiff,[69] but statements to third persons and not communicated to attachment plaintiff are not effective for this purpose.[70]

Where two separate attachment suits are brought and levies are made thereunder, a settlement by attachment defendant with one of the attaching plaintiffs will not extinguish any cause of action which he may have against the other for a wrongful attachment.[71]

Giving bond. It has been held that, where a defendant in attachment procures the discharge of the attachment and release of the property by giving the bond provided by statute, he cannot thereafter maintain an action for wrongful attachment;[72] but there is also authority for the view that the execution by defendant in attachment of the redelivery bond provided for by statute cannot be regarded as an admission of record that the order of attachment was rightfully obtained or set up as a bar to his right of action on the attachment bond.[73]

(2) Consent

Consent to an attachment is a defense if the attachment has been sued out in reliance thereon but not otherwise.

Consent to an attachment is no defense where the writ was not sued out because of the consent but because the party believed he had grounds for an attachment.[74]

Where the attachment is against a partnership, the consent of one partner bars his right to recover for injuries sustained thereby.[75] Where not collusive the consent of one partner has been held binding on the firm,[76] but there is other authority to the contrary.[77]

c. Good Faith; Justness of Claim

Good faith or justness of claim is no defense.

The good faith of the attachment plaintiff is no defense as against a recovery of actual damages,[78] but the good faith of the attaching plaintiff is available as a defense to the extent of preventing a recovery of exemplary or punitive damages.[79] Similarly the justness of the claim is no defense to a suit for actual damages if the attachment is actually wrongful.[80]

d. Probable Cause; Insolvency of Debtor

Probable cause is a defense against punitive but not against actual damages. Insolvency of the debtor is no defense.

In the absence of a statute so providing, the existence of probable cause for suing out the writ is no defense against recovery of actual damages,[81] although it may avail to prevent recovery of exemplary or punitive damages.[82] The fact that there was probable cause for suing out the writ is a complete defense, where, by statute, lack of probable cause is necessary to authorize recovery.[83]

It is no defense to an action for wrongful attachment that defendant was insolvent or suffering pecuniary embarrassment.[84]

e. Advice of Counsel

That the writ was sued out on advice of counsel is no defense to a claim for actual damages, but it may be a defense against exemplary or punitive damages.

That the writ was sued out on advice of counsel is, in the absence of statute, no defense to a claim for actual damages,[85] although such advice may be a defense so far as exemplary damages are claimed,[86] providing that it was based on a full and fair statement of the facts of the case and was followed in good faith.[87] Similarly the attachment plaintiff cannot be held immune from actual damages under a statute which would free him from liability if probable cause existed where, although he has acted on the advice of counsel, he failed to submit all the facts within his knowledge to the attorney.[88]

f. Subsequent Levy; Return of Property

A subsequent levy or the return of the property does not constitute a defense.

In a suit to recover damages for wrongful attachment it cannot be shown that other attachments than defendant's were subsequently levied on the property.[89]

The return of property taken under a wrongful attachment does not furnish a complete defense.[90]

§ 541. Jurisdiction and Venue

The action may be brought in the county where the attachment took place where such is permitted by statute.

Under a statute providing that an action for a trespass may be prosecuted in the county in which the cause of action arose, it has been held that an action for the wrongful seizure of property under a writ of attachment, whether upon the attachment bond or otherwise, may be brought in the county, where the seizure took place, even though none of the defendants are residents of such county.[91]

§ 542. Time to Sue and Limitations

The action must be brought within the time allowed by the statute of limitations.

An action for wrongful attachment must, of course, be brought within the time allowed by the statute of limitations.[92]

§ 543. Parties

The action must in general be by and against the real parties in interest.

Where an assignment for the benefit of creditors has been accepted by some of the beneficiaries and the assignee has taken possession of the property, he is the proper party to maintain an action, independent of the attachment bond for the injury resulting from a wrongful attachment under process against the assignor,[93] whether the seizure was before the assignment[94] or after he had taken possession of the property,[95] and the assignor cannot bring such an action.[96]

Where a personal judgment could be rendered against a sheriff who wrongfully attached exempt property, the sheriff is not a mere nominal party to a suit for wrongful attachment.[97]

§ 545. —— On Behalf of Defendant in Attachment

a. In general
b. As to damages

a. In General

The declaration or complaint must allege the facts essential to the plaintiff's cause of action.

The declaration or complaint in an action for wrongful attachment must show that the attachment has been wrongfully sued out and it must state every material fact constituting the cause of action.[98] The fact of dissolution of the attachment should be alleged in jurisdictions in which no cause of action for wrongful attachment arises until dissolution,[99] but where attachment defendant may proceed for a recovery of damages for a wrongful attachment notwithstanding the pendency of the main action, it is unnecessary to allege a final determination of the action.[1] The complaint should describe the property levied on or state facts showing an excuse for failure to do so.[2] Where a recovery may be had for the mere suing out of a wrongful attachment, even though there has been no levy thereunder, it is not necessary that a levy should be alleged.[3] An allegation that plaintiff was the owner of the attached property on a certain day, which was the day of the levy, is sufficient, since the law ordinarily takes no notice of fractions of a day.[4]

Probable cause; malice. Where malice or want of probable cause is, under the statute, an element of wrongful attachment, it is necessary to make the allegation, even though only actual damages are sought or the form of the proceeding is such that only actual damages are recoverable,[5] but the rule is otherwise where actual damages are recoverable, notwithstanding there was probable cause where the recovery sought is for actual damages only.[6] If exemplary damages are sought, malice or want of probable cause must be alleged.[7] Where a wrongful attachment without malice is actionable it has been held that it is not necessary to sue on one count for the wrongful and on another for the malicious attachment of property, the reason being that if an action on the case will lie for wrongful attachment malice merely goes in aggravation of damages.[8]

Reconvention. A general allegation that the attachment was wrongfully sued out is sufficient in a plea in reconvention.[9]

b. As to Damages

Allegations as to special damages must be clear and definite.

Allegations as to damages should be certain and definite,[10] but, although ambiguous or alleging only

Knowledge of falsity of pleadings
Allegations that the attaching creditors' statement that the debtor was about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud, etc., was false and known to be false are sufficient, although the pleadings established the property was to be disposed of without cash return—Hoover v. First Nat Bank, (Tex Civ.App.) 192 S.W. 1149.

Homestead
A complaint to recover for the wrongful attachment of a homestead exempt from levy, which sets forth all the statements required by the statute for a declaration of a homestead and that the property had not been abandoned as such, is sufficient—McNabb v. Byrnes, 268 P. 428, 92 Cal App. 331.

Allegation held sufficient

Denial of ground for attachment
One reconvening for wrongful attachment must deny the existence of the ground on which the writ issued, but a plea alleging generally that the writ was wrongfully sued out is sufficient to admit evidence of that fact, in absence of special exception—Richburg v. McIlwaine, (Tex.Civ.App.) 181 S.W. 1166.

Portion of damages caused by attachment
Where a complaint for making a wrongful ancillary attachment did not show what part of the alleged damages was caused by the attachment and what part was incurred in defending the main suit, a demurrer on the ground of ambiguity should be sustained—Peterson v. Spears, 209 P. 509, 72 Colo. 40.

general damages, a complaint will be sustained as stating a cause of action if some damages, even though nominal, are recoverable.[11] The better practice is to itemize the damages,[12] although it is permissible to claim a gross sum embracing all the items.[13] Where special damages are sought, they must be specially pleaded.[14] Thus, unless specially pleaded, attachment defendant cannot recover for attorney's fees expended in relation to the attachment,[15] or for special injuries to business[16] or resulting from loss of credit[17] or reputation.[18] Failure to allege and prove that damages sustained were not paid will not preclude recovery, where no objection to the complaint specified that there was no allegation of nonpayment of damages, and the case was tried on the theory that the damages were not paid.[19]

Reconvention. Where actual and vindictive damages are sought in a plea of reconvention, each should be set out in the pleadings as a separate cause of action.[20]

§ 546. —— On Behalf of Plaintiff in Attachment

Pleadings on the part of the attachment plaintiff are controlled by the rules applicable to pleadings of defendants generally.

A plea to the jurisdiction cannot be interposed by plaintiff in attachment after he has pleaded to the merits.[21] If the answer admits the seizure of the property, attachment plaintiff cannot allege, on the trial, that the property had been previously seized by another creditor.[22]

§ 547. —— Issues, Proof, and Variance

The evidence must conform to the issues presented by the pleadings.

The evidence must conform to the pleadings of the party by whom it is offered.[23] Where defendant's right to counterclaim for damages resulting from the wrongful levy of an attachment in the action was agreed on, so that the only question was the amount of such damages, evidence as to whether the attachment was properly sued out on reasonable cause was immaterial.[24] Under a plea of general issue or general denial it is proper to show a judgment on the merits in favor of attachment defendant in another action for the same cause,[25] and it may be shown that other attachments were issued at about the same time as plaintiff's and levied on the same goods, and that after the dissolution of plaintiff's writ the goods of attachment defendant, which were of a perishable nature, were held by the sheriff under such other writs, and sold on the petition of the parties to such other writs.[26] Under an allegation that the levying of the attachment injured plaintiff's business and credit, evidence that the news of the attachment was published by a mercantile agency is admissible without being more specifically pleaded.[27] In a proceed-

Loss through foreclosure sale

Allegations that plaintiffs had arranged a sale to parties able to pay for the land, and that the actual market value was much less when sold at a foreclosure sale sufficiently alleged actionable damages against a general demurrer—Hoover v. First Nat. Bank, (Tex Civ.App.) 192 S.W. 1149.

Recovery for conversion and exemplary damages

Pleadings alleging conversion by virtue of wrongful attachment and alleging value of property and damages in the same amount, and also praying for exemplary damages and general and special relief, are sufficient to warrant recovery of damages, and should not be limited to recovery for conversion only—Baker v. Black, (Tex Civ App) 83 S.W (2d) 311, error granted.

Loss of sale

(1) Damages through the loss of sale of property because of the wrongful attachment are sufficiently grounded by a showing of the prospective purchaser's willingness and ability to perform and attachment defendant's compliance with the terms of the contract—Hoover v First Nat Bank, (Tex Civ App) 192 S.W. 1149.

(2) Allegations that the prospective purchaser was to give notes which he was able to pay, and that a mortgagee had agreed to extend his debt until such notes were due, allege damages with sufficient certainty—Hoover v. First Nat Bank, supra.

(3) Allegations that the extension of a mortgage on plaintiffs' property depended on closing a prospective sale sufficiently negatived the contention that the mortgage, and not the attachment, caused the sale's failure.—Hoover v. First Nat. Bank, supra.

(4) Allegations that plaintiffs' proposed sale of real estate was broken up by the attachment levy are sufficient, despite the improbability of a trade for some one hundred thirty-seven thousand dollars, being interrupted by attachment for some four thousand dollars with large partial payments already made—Hoover v. First Nat. Bank, supra.

ing to assess damages on the dissolution of an attachment, the issue to be tried and determined by the jury is whether the said attachment was wrongfully sued out, and not whether the statements in the affidavit are actually true or false.[28] Malice or want of probable cause for the attachment need not be proved, as a rule, to recover actual damages only.[29]

§ 548. Evidence

Matters relating to the burden of proof and presumptions, and to the admissibility and sufficiency of evidence, in actions of the character under consideration will be discussed in the following sections.

§ 549. —— Presumptions and Burden of Proof

a Presumptions
b. Burden of proof

a. Presumptions

The presumptions are in favor of the rightfulness and regularity of the attachment.

In an action for wrongful attachment, the presumption is that the writ was properly and lawfully issued,[30] and was sufficient to justify a levy on the property of defendant named therein;[31] the mere fact that the attachment writ was quashed or that the attachment suit was abandoned or dismissed affords no basis for a presumption that the attachment was wrongful.[32]

b. Burden of Proof

Attachment defendant has the burden of proving the matters essential to his recovery.

Attachment defendant has the burden of proving that the attachment was wrongful.[33] Thus, where such matters are essential to his recovery, he must show want of probable cause for suing out the writ,[34] and that there has been an actual levy on his property.[35] The burden is on him to show that he has been injured[36] and the extent of such injury.[37] To prove damages to personalty in possession of the sheriff under the wrongful attachment, there must be sufficient evidence from which the monetary loss can be determined.[38] Where plaintiff alleges that his property has been converted by the refusal of defendant's attorney to deliver it to plaintiff on the latter's written demand, he must show such attorney's authority to receive or act on such demand.[39]

a. In General

Otherwise competent and material evidence, which is relevant to the issues, is properly admitted.

As in civil cases generally, in an action for wrongful attachment, evidence which is competent and material to the issues is properly admitted,[40] and incompetent and immaterial evidence is properly excluded.[41] Expert testimony by one who has no spe-

Release suggesting duress

Where, in an action for wrongful attachment, defendant, plaintiff in attachment, pleaded that, when the claim was settled and the attachment vacated, plaintiff, defendant in attachment, released him from all liability, evidence of such release was admissible, although the complaint showed that the attachment was greatly in excess of the amount due, so as to suggest duress—Hayes v Union Mercantile Co, 70 P. 975, 27 Mont. 264.

Md—Sterling v. Marine Bank, 87 A. 697, 120 Md. 396, Ann Cas 1915A 1219.

Illegal sale of liquor on attached premises

Where plaintiff owed defendant rent on a building occupied as a hotel and defendant sued him therefor, brought attachment, took possession of the personalty, and ejected plaintiff, and the attachment was dissolved, in an action for damages evidence that plaintiff was illegally selling liquor, of which defendant knew before he demanded rent, but of which he made no complaint, was properly excluded—Wellington v. Spencer, 132 P. 675, 37 Okl. 461, 46 L R A (N S) 469.

Intent of attachment defendant

Defendant in attachment cannot testify respecting his intent in disposing of his property, the issue becial knowledge of the subject is inadmissible.[42]

Facts and circumstances within the knowledge of attachment plaintiff, giving him reason to believe the truth of the facts stated in the affidavit, are competent to show probable cause for suing out the writ;[43] but matters which were not known to attachment plaintiff at the time of suing out the writ cannot, of course, be shown on the issue of probable cause therefor.[44] In a suit where an attachment has been issued for which defendant claims damages by the plea of reconvention, it is proper to refuse to allow him to be asked whether or not he was willing for the attachment to issue.[45] If the general reputation of attachment defendant is put in issue by the evidence, he may offer evidence to sustain it.[46] In support of a counterclaim for damages caused by a wrongful attachment of a stock of goods, attachment defendant's inventory of the stock is admissible in connection with other evidence on the question of the identity of the property sold.[47] Evidence that the proceeds of the attached property were applied to the satisfaction of the judgment obtained by plaintiff in the attachment suit has been held admissible to show good faith on the part of plaintiff.[48]

b. As to Malice

Where malice is a material factor, otherwise competent evidence, relevant thereto is properly admitted either to prove or disprove its existence

The attachment plaintiff, for the purpose of showing absence of malice, may prove that the debt on which the attachment issued was actually due,[49] that prior to the suing out of the writ attachment defendant had admitted the facts on which the affidavit for attachment was based;[50] that, at the time of suing out the writ, the attachment defendant was greatly involved in debt,[51] or that the money realized by a sale of the attached property was applied to the satisfaction of the judgment obtained by plaintiff in the attachment suit.[52] Evidence that attachment plaintiff acted without malice is not admissible where only actual damages are sought.[53] On the issue of malice, it is incompetent to show that plaintiff in attachment was angry with defendant in attachment after the time of the levy,[54] the sending of notices of the attachment to the commercial papers if plaintiff is not first connected with the sending of such notices,[55] or the value of the property seized where it is not proposed to show that the levy was made on more property than the writ authorized or that plaintiff in attachment gave directions as to the property on which it should be levied,[56] neither is it permissible to introduce affidavits for continuance made by the sheriff, attachment plaintiffs' attorneys, and others in the case in support of the theory that the attaching creditors and the sheriff knew that the debtor's transfer of his goods was an honest one, and that the attachments were levied for vexatious purposes and to compel the grantee to pay the grantor's debts.[57] The intention of the officer levying the attachment is immaterial in the action.[58]

c. As to Value of Property Attached

Matters pertinent to the value of the property attached may be shown.

In determining the value of the property attached at the time of the attachment, it is competent to show what it cost,[59] and an inventory of the goods seized, made by defendant in attachment, is also admissible for this purpose.[60] Plaintiff in attachment may testify as to the value of the attached property where he has shown himself qualified to do so.[61] Written bids for the property, made after advertisement by the receiver appointed therein, are admissible in evidence as tending to show whether the goods sold for a fair price, even if not sufficient of themselves to prove the value.[62] It is not competent to show the amount of insurance that attachment defendant had on the property seized,[63] and evidence as to the value of the goods a considerable time after the attachment is properly refused.[64]

d. As to Damages

Evidence as to damages should be confined to items for which recovery may be had.

Evidence of the amount of attachment defendant's business and profits[65] is admissible on the question of damages, as is also evidence of loss of business.[66] Evidence that defendant in attachment stated that he did not want the property back because he could do better in a suit for damages is not admissible where only actual damages are sought.[67] Where realty and personalty are both attached, and attachment defendant is not deprived of the use of the realty, the value thereof is immaterial on the question of damages for the seizure of the personalty.[68] In an action for wrongful attachment on the ground that the debtor was about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors, evidence that he stated, prior to the attachment, that if sued he would not pay at all is admissible on the issue of his right to recover exemplary damages.[69]

Injury to credit. Evidence of the amount of attachment defendant's credit and the effect of the attachment on it is admissible.[70] Evidence, for attachment plaintiff, that attachment defendant was reputed insolvent at the time of the attachment is competent on the question whether the latter has sustained any, and what, injury to his credit.[71]

§ 551. —— Weight and Sufficiency

General rules are applicable in determining the weight and sufficiency of the evidence.

As in other civil actions, the verdict or findings are sufficiently sustained by a preponderance of the evidence.[72] That plaintiff in attachment did not act with malice or without probable cause may be shown by the circumstances which existed at the time.[73] While the fact that a writ of attachment was sued out without probable cause does not necessarily establish malice on the part of the attaching plaintiff,[74] it may support an inference of malice sufficient to supply the place of direct proof,[75] the jury being at liberty to draw the inference or not, according to the facts and circumstances of the case.[76] The fact that an attachment was maliciously sued out does not warrant an inference that it was sued out without probable cause,[77] nor is the mere fact that the attachment was discharged,[78] or that judgment was rendered for defendant in the main action,[79] sufficient to establish that the attachment was issued maliciously and without probable cause.

Where the answer in an action for wrongful attachment admits the attachment proceedings, the issue of the attachment, and an adverse decision on appeal, these facts will be deemed sufficiently proved without the introduction of the record of the attachment suit.[80] Payment into court and tender of a sum of money by defendants in attachment amount to a conclusive admission that such money was due when the attachment issued.[81]

Publication of attachment proceedings

To prove injury to credit, it is competent to introduce evidence that an account of the attachment proceedings was published and to show the extent of the circulation of the publication—Brand v Hinchman, 36 N W. 664, 62 Mich. 590, 13 Am S R. 362—6 C.J. p 528 note 44.

§ 552. Trial

a. Questions of law and fact
b. Instructions
c. Verdict or findings

a. Questions of Law and Fact

The rules applicable in other civil cases as to the determination of questions of law and questions of fact control in an action for wrongful attachment.

As in civil cases generally, questions of fact are for the determination of the jury.[84] Where the evidence is conflicting, it is for the jury to determine whether the attachment was sued out wrongfully,[85] maliciously,[86] or without probable cause,[87] and whether a writ of attachment was returned in an action not entered.[88] Similarly, it is for the jury to determine whether injury resulted from the attachment,[89] the value of the goods attached,[90] and the amount of damages to be allowed;[91] but costs definitely fixed by law are to be taxed by the court, and there is no occasion to submit the amount to be allowed to the jury.[92] Issues on which no evidence has been introduced,[93] or on which the evidence is uncontroverted,[94] should not be submitted to the jury. Where no question of fact is involved, the court should determine the issue as to the existence of grounds for the attachment,[95] and the question of damages must not be submitted before the court has made this determination.[96]

b. Instructions

General rules apply as to the instructions.

The court should instruct as to the law applicable to the issues,[97] and the elements and measure of damages.[98] Instructions must not proceed on an assumption not warranted by the facts,[99] invade the province of the jury,[1] or be misleading.[2] Instructions containing correct statements of law predicated on uncontradicted evidence are properly given,[3] and where

Instructions not misleading

the uncontroverted evidence shows that the attachment was wrongfully sued out, a peremptory instruction to this effect may be given.[4] Instructions pertaining to issues which are not necessarily involved are properly refused.[5]

c. Verdict or Findings

A verdict contrary to the law or to the evidence cannot be sustained.

A verdict contrary to the law or unsupported by the evidence should be set aside.[6]

§ 553. Judgment

The judgment must be supported by the pleadings and proof.

Where one of the attaching creditors files no answer to a suit for wrongful attachment, and plaintiff fails to show liability as to any of such creditors, it is not error to deny judgment by default against a creditor thus failing to file an answer.[7] Where the jury found specially that defendant in attachment was entitled to damages for the wrongful suing out of the writ, and that the claim on which it was sued out was not yet due, it was held proper to render a judgment for the amount of the damages found, not diminished by the amount of attachment plaintiff's claim.[8]

§ 554. Appeal and Error

Matters of appeal and error pertinent to this topic conform to the general rules in civil cases discussed in the title Appeal and Error.

§ 555. Damages

The measure of damages does not depend on the particular remedy pursued.

Damages for wrongful attachment are no different whether the action to recover them be upon the bond, a common-law action for wrongful attachment, or by way of counterclaim.[9]

§ 556. —— Actual or Compensatory Damages

Compensation for injuries and losses which are the direct and proximate result of the wrong is recoverable as actual damages.

Where the suing out of the writ was wrongful, the attachment defendant is entitled to recover his actual damages,[10] that is, compensation for injuries and losses which are the direct and proximate result of the wrongful suing out of the writ and the seizure and detention of his property thereunder.[11] Actual loss or injury must have been sustained or no compensatory damages are recoverable.[12]

Attachment of realty

The wrongful attachment of realty affords the owner thereof no ground for recovery of actual damages where he has sustained no loss—Taylor v. Smith, (Tex.Civ.App.) 27 S W.(2d) 825—Spillman v. Weston, (Tex Civ App.) 200 S.W. 557.

§ 557. —— Nominal Damages

Nominal damages may be recovered where no actual damage has resulted.

Where a writ of attachment is wrongfully sued out and levied on property, but no actual damage results, nominal damages may be recovered,[13] but nothing more is recoverable[14]

§ 558. —— Exemplary or Punitive Damages

Exemplary or punitive damages are recoverable where actual damage has been sustained and the writ was sued out maliciously and without probable cause.

Exemplary or punitive damages may be allowed where the writ was sued out maliciously and without probable cause,[15] but there can be no recovery beyond actual damages where the attachment was sued out in good faith and based on probable cause[16] In a number of jurisdictions it has been held that the elements of malice and want of probable cause must both be present[17] Where the attachment defendant fails to show any actual damages he cannot recover exemplary damages[18] even though the writ was maliciously sued out[19]

§ 559. —— Elements or Items of Damages in General

Items of damages which are directly and proximately the result of the wrongful attachment are, as a general rule, recoverable.

In accordance with the rule stated in § 556 above, that the recovery of actual damages is limited to compensation for injuries which are the direct and proximate result of the wrongful attachment, the items of damage recoverable are limited to those which flow naturally and reasonably therefrom.[20]

Damages accruing subsequent to the abandonment of the levy are recoverable where the abandonment is unknown to the owner of the property and no actual notice is given to him.[21]

Loss, destruction, or conversion of property.[22] Where property wrongfully attached has been lost, destroyed, converted, or sold, or for any reason cannot be recovered by the attachment defendant, he may recover, as actual damages, the value of the property at the time and place of the seizure,[23] with interest on such value[24] from the time of the seizure

Attachment of tobacco crop

Where a decedent wrongfully attached plaintiffs' tobacco crop before it was stripped, packed, and put in hogsheads, plaintiffs' damage, recoverable against the personal representatives, was the reasonable market value of the tobacco at the time of the levy, with interest from such time—Shields' Adm'rs v. to the time of the trial[25] or of the rendition of the judgment.[26]

Injury to, or depreciation in value of, property; loss of sale. Injury to, or depreciation in value of, personal property wrongfully attached is an element of actual damages,[27] even though such injury or depreciation was due to the negligence of the levying officer.[28]

While, ordinarily, depreciation in the value of real property, which occurs while the levy remains in force, there being no change of possession or loss of the use thereof, is not the immediate result of the attachment and no recovery beyond nominal damages can be had therefor,[29] where a pending sale is broken up by the levy itself, unaided by the act or delinquency of attachment defendant, and depreciation and loss follow, there is ample foundation for the recovery of actual damages.[30] The loss of a sale alone does not warrant damages if the property has not depreciated in value.[31]

Loss of use of property. Although the property wrongfully attached has been returned to, or recovered by, the attachment defendant, it is proper, in estimating his damages to consider the injury which he has sustained by being deprived of the property and to award him the value of the use of the property during the time it was held under the writ.[32] Where his possession is in no way interfered with, the attachment defendant cannot recover for the loss of the use of his property.[33]

Loss of, or injury to, business. In some jurisdictions, defendant in attachment is permitted to recover compensation for injury to, or loss of, his business as an element of damages for a wrongful attachment,[34] but in other jurisdictions the injury is not viewed as such proximate or natural result of the attachment as to constitute an element of damages if an award of exemplary damages would not be proper,[35] at least where recovery is sought, not for the detention of the property or

Inquiries as to price

Where an attachment was wrongfully sued out against a lot, defendant's statement that he had some inquiries as to the price of the lot and had conversed with another person about building a house thereon, but, owing to the attachment, nothing had ensued, was of too remote and speculative damages upon which to base a recovery.—Turner v. interruption of its use but for the value of the property taken.[36] However, where malice and want of probable cause exist, injury to, or loss of, business may be considered in estimating damages.[37]

Loss of probable or prospective profits. In some jurisdictions loss of probable or prospective profits is recoverable even though the attachment was merely wrongful,[38] but in others this is not an element of damage unless the attachment was sued out maliciously and without probable cause,[39] at least where recovery is sought for the value of the property taken and not for its detention or interruption of its use.[40]

Injury to credit. In the absence of malice and want of probable cause the general view is that damages for loss of credit cannot be recovered, being too remote and speculative to be considered in determining actual damages,[41] but there is authority which holds it to be recoverable as an element of actual damage.[42] A recovery for loss of credit has been sustained where the suing out of the writ was malicious and without probable cause,[43] but there is some authority to the effect that it is not an element of damage even though the attachment was maliciously sued out[44]

Injury to feelings. The authorities are not in accord as to whether injury to feelings constitutes an element of damage for wrongful attachment. In some jurisdictions recovery may be had for injury to feelings if the attachment was sued out maliciously and without probable cause,[45] but there is other authority holding that it is not recoverable notwithstanding the maliciousness of the attachment.[46] In the absence of malice or want of probable cause, recovery for such injury has been refused,[47] but there is also authority that a recovery for humiliation and mortification may be had.[48]

Injury to reputation. Damages for injury to reputation have been held not recoverable unless the attachment was malicious as well as wrongful,[49] but there is other authority to the effect that this constitutes an element of damage even in the absence of malice.[50]

Loss of time. Loss of time incident to defending against the attachment has been held not an element of damages.[51] However, it has been held that damages for the time spent in securing a release of the levy may be recovered,[52] and where attachment defendant's stock of goods is wrongfully attached he may recover for the resulting loss of time in his business.[53]

Measure of damages for loss of time

Where a creditor wrongfully attaches his debtor's stock, the Subsequent levies. An attachment defendant cannot recover, as an item of actual damage for wrongful attachment, injuries resulting from the levy of attachments by other creditors in consequence of the attachment.[54]

Interest. Although it has been held that interest on money attached[55] or on the damages allowed for wrongful attachment[56] is not recoverable, there is authority for the view that an allowance of interest on the money[57] or the value of personal property,[58] but not real property,[59] wrongfully detained is proper.

§ 560. —— Expenses of Litigation

a. General expenses
b. Counsel fees

a. General Expenses

Reasonable and necessary expenses incurred in defending the attachment proceedings are recoverable, but the expenses incurred in the main suit may not be recovered.

As a rule, reasonable and necessary expenses incurred by the attachment defendant in defending against the wrongful attachment are recoverable as part of the damages.[60] However, expenses incurred in defending the main action are not generally recoverable,[61] and expenses of litigation to procure redress for the trespass cannot be allowed in the absence of aggravation for which punitive damages are recoverable.[62]

b. Counsel Fees

(1) Defending against attachment
(2) Defending principal action

(1) Defending against Attachment

Generally, counsel fees incurred in defending against the attachment may be recovered, but there is authority to the contrary.

In some jurisdictions it is held that the attachment defendant cannot recover any counsel fees as part of his actual damages,[63] but the more generally prevailing view is that reasonable counsel fees incurred or expended in defending against the wrongful attachment are recoverable.[64] The right to recover counsel fees is the same whether such fees have actually been paid or merely incurred,[65] but either actual payment or a definite measure of the debtor's damages for loss of time is what his time would have been worth in his particular business, and not his reasonable wages, or what he would have been able to earn in other employment—Lord v. Wood, 94 N.W. 842, 120 Iowa 303.

An award for services rendered under the eye of the court by an attorney whose fee is not disclosed may be fixed by the court—Jackson v Patton, (La.App.) 152 So. 597 liability to pay must be shown.[66] Where it is impossible to differentiate between the attorney's services for dissolving the attachment and those for defending the main suit, attorney's fees cannot form an element of damages for the wrongful issuance of the writ.[67]

(2) Defending Principal Action

Counsel fees incurred in defending the principal action cannot be recovered unless a trial of the main action is indispensable to the attachment proceedings.

As a general rule, allowance of counsel fees must be limited to those incurred for services in connection with the attachment itself, and cannot be allowed for services in defending the principal action.[68] However, recovery of counsel fees may be permitted where the entire defense to the attachment action merely tends to show the wrongful issuance of the attachment,[69] or where a trial of the principal action is necessary in order to dispose of the attachment.[70]

§ 561. —— Matters in Mitigation

Matters in mitigation of damages may properly be shown.

Matters which affect the amount of damages actually suffered by attachment defendant may be shown in mitigation thereof.[71] It is matter in mitigation or reduction of damages that there has been a return and acceptance of the property seized under the attachment;[72] that the proceeds derived from the sale on execution were applied on the judgment against the attachment defendant;[73] that the attachment defendant had recovered back the property for less than its value;[74] that after seizure the attaching creditor bought the property at a sale under foreclosure of a lien placed thereon by the attachment defendant in favor of another creditor,[75] or that the party suing out the attachment was security on a bond of the attachment defendant, and that the latter at the time the writ was sued out was about to remove his property from the state.[76]

Justness of the claim in the principal suit is no circumstance in mitigation of damages in an action for wrongful attachment;[77] nor can damages be reduced by showing that at the time of the seizure the debtor contemplated selling his goods in bulk at a sacrifice,[78] or that the attachment defendant was insolvent.[79]

§ 562. —— Amount of Allowance in General

The amount of actual damages recoverable is such as will compensate the attachment defendant for his loss proximately caused by the wrong. Exemplary damages should be in proportion to the actual damages.

The amount of actual damages recoverable is such as will compensate the attachment defendant for his loss proximately caused by the act of wrongful attachment and deprivation of possession,[80]

Jurisdiction gained by attachment

Where jurisdiction in the cause is gained by attachment on the ground of nonresidence, and it is necessary to defend the case on its merits to determine whether attachment was wrongful, attorney's fees for procuring dissolution of wrongful attachment include those for contesting the merits.—Alith-Prouty Co. v. Wallace, 233 P. 144, 32 Wyo. 392, 39 A.L.R. 513, rehearing denied 234 P. 504, 32 Wyo. 392, 39 A.L.R. 513.

Refusal to accept redelivery

Where plaintiff, whose stock had been seized on attachment against him, refused a tender of the goods back under circumstances indicating an intent to create a situation from which he might profit, and subsequently brought suit against the sheriff and the attaching creditor and her agent for malicious use of the writ, defendants were liable for the damages naturally resulting from an oppressive execution of the process, and, although plaintiff's refusal to accept redelivery should be considered in assessing damages, it did not destroy the cause of action unless the tender was made at a time when no damages could have resulted.—Black v. with a full consideration of all the elements of damage for which recovery is permitted[81] A fortiori, actual damages are limited to that amount.[82]

Exemplary or punitive damages should be in proportion to the actual damage sustained,[83] the imposition of disproportionate damages indicates that the verdict of the jury was reached through prejudice or passion, or failure to consider the evidence.[84]

Double damages. Under a statute which permits double damages for wrongful seizure of the property, and double its value if sold, double the value of the property may not be recovered if it is not sold, even though the actual damage sustained consists of nothing save the value of the property.[85]

§ 563. —— Limitation to Amount Claimed in Pleading

The amount of damages is limited to that claimed in the pleading.

The damages recoverable by an attachment defendant for a wrongful attachment cannot of course exceed the amount which he has claimed therefor in his pleading.[86]

§ 564. —— Set-Offs

The judgment recovered by attachment plaintiff in the main suit and money realized from the sale of the property which has been paid the attachment defendant may be utilized to offset damages in the action for wrongful attachment.

In an action for wrongful attachment, the judgment recovered for the purchase price of the goods attached by the attachment plaintiff in the main suit may be asserted as a credit against the claim.

Attorney's fees

(1) Four hundred dollars attorney's fee for procuring dissolution of attachment of property valued at twenty-five thousand dollars, and involving two days' trial and examination of numerous witnesses, was held reasonable.—General Motors Acceptance Corporation v. Sneed, 119 So. 417, 167 La. 432, modifying 121 So. 254, 9 La.App. 471.

(2) A fee of two hundred fifty dollars, fixed by a district judge for an attorney's services, appraised by several practicing attorneys as worth at least three hundred dollars, in releasing nonresident defendants' wrongfully attached property, worth over twenty-five thousand dollars, was held neither excessive nor inadequate.—Price v. Foster, 161 So. 161, 182 La. 79.

Humiliation, worry, and attorney's fees

Where seven hundred fifty dollars, the sum due from a third party to defendant wife, was garnisheed under a writ of attachment, an award of one hundred dollars to each of defendant spouses for humiliation and worry caused by wrongful attachment, plus one hundred dollars to the wife and fifty dollars to the husband for attorney's fees, was held not inadequate.—Aniaman v. Nagle, 148 So. 885, 177 La. 583.

Actual value of goods converted

Where plaintiff wrongfully attached defendant's stock of merchandise, preventing intended sale and converting goods to its own use, defendant could recover as damages no more than the actual value of the goods.—Palo Sav. Bank v. Cameron, 168 N.W. 769, 184 Iowa 183

Costs and expenses

In an action to recover damages for unlawful attachment of household goods, where the evidence showed that the goods were attached after plaintiff had left the town in which they were, and that the goods were held for about five or six weeks, when they were released, a judgment for eight hundred and eight dollars and twelve cents was erroneous, the costs and expenses which seemed to be the proper elements of damage sustained by the plaintiff amounting to about one hundred dollars.—Henderson v. Weidman, 130 N.W. 579, 88 Neb. 813

Loss of use exceeding value of property

In an action for damages caused by wrongful levy of a writ of attachment, a six hundred dollar verdict for loss of the use of a team of horses and a wagon of the probable value of about two hundred dollars for about nine months was held excessive.—Mannford State Bank v. Arnold, 221 P. 76, 105 Okl. 131

Loss of reputation and humiliation

In an action for wrongful attachment, where it appeared that defendant had levied on and sold a horse belonging to plaintiff valued at one hundred dollars, it was held that an allowance of five hundred dollars for loss of reputation and humiliation from the levy of the attachment was excessive.—Jensen v. Hallam, 70 N.W. 1121, 51 Neb. 492.

Exemplary damages held excessive

Allowance of one hundred twenty-five dollars exemplary damages for attachment, only five dollars actual damages being allowed, and no brutal or harsh treatment being shown, is excessive.—Soesbe v. Lines, 164 N.W. 129, 180 Iowa 943

Exemplary damages held not excessive

(1) Where the attachment proceeding was unwarranted and resorted to more as a means of oppression or extortion than to preserve legal rights, a verdict of two hundred dollars as exemplary damages is not excessive, although the actual damages are assessed at only sixty dollars.—Byford v. Girton, 57 N.W. 588, 90 Iowa 661

(2) An allowance of five hundred dollars exemplary damages, where the actual damages allowed were ninety dollars, is not so disproportionate as to authorize the setting aside of the verdict.—Harkleroad v. Leonard, 67 S.W. 127, 28 Tex.Civ.App. 133

(3) A verdict for thirty-five dollars for the value of a bale of cotton wrongfully attached, and for fifty dollars for exemplary damages, is not excessive.—Lister v. Campbell, (Tex.Civ.App.) 46 S.W. 876.

although not the proper subject for a plea of counterclaim or set-off,[87] but, where one wrongfully levies an attachment on exempt property, converting it to his own use, it has been held that he cannot offset his debt against his liability for the value of the property attached.[88] Where the attachment plaintiff has levied several wrongful attachments and has satisfied the debt by a sale under one of the levies, the payment to the attachment defendant of the surplus realized from the sale can be utilized to offset damages only as to the particular attachment through which it was realized and not as against the other claims.[89] Where defendant in attachment reconvenes for damages, the attachment plaintiff cannot set up as an offset against such claim that, when the property was sold under the levy, he bought it in and settled mortgages on it which were in existence before the attachment, and ask to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagees.[90]

§ 565. Costs

Costs in actions for wrongful attachment being in the absence of specific statutes controlled by the rules applicable to civil actions generally, the questions relating thereto are considered in the title Costs. Cases, if any may arise, which are not within such rules will be found in the Pocket Parts.

ATTACK. In common understanding, the word has been held to mean to fall upon with force or to assault, as with force of arms;[1] and, in a particular connection, to impeach.[2]

Phrases: "Actual attack,"[3] "attack on the credibility of a witness by way of impeachment,"[4] "preparation for such attack,"[5] and "undertake an attack."[6]

ATTAIN. To arrive at or to reach or come to by progression or motion; hence to achieve or accomplish, that is, to reach by effort; to compass; to gain;[7] also, to acquire or to gain or obtain possession of.[8]

Phrase: "Attaining the age of twenty-one years."[9]

ATTAINDER. It has been said that the word "attainder" is derived from the words "attincta" and "attinctura," and that it is defined to be the stain or corruption of the blood of a criminal capitally condemned; the immediate inseparable consequence of the common law, on the pronouncing the sentence of death;[10] that extinction of civil rights and capacities which takes place wherever a person who has committed treason or felony receives sentence of death for his crime;[11] a mark of infamy by means of which the offender becomes "attinctus" or "blackened."[12]

Bills of attainder. The phrase, as it is used in constitutions, federal and state, is defined and distinguished from other terms, and the subject matter fully treated in the title Constitutional Law §§ 452–455 [12 C.J. p 1108 notes 35–47]. It has been said that bills of attainder, or acts of attainder, as they

ATTAINMENT. Act of attaining; also, that which is attained.[16]

ATTAINT. Attainted, stained, or blackened;[17] convicted of a crime.[18]

In old English practice, a writ which lay to inquire whether a jury of twelve men gave a false verdict.[19]

Phrase: "Attainted of waste."[20]

ATTAINT D'UNE CAUSE. In French law, the gain of a suit.[21]

ATTEINDRE. Law French, to reach to; to overtake or come to.[22]

ATTEMPT.

As Noun

The term, as used in the criminal law, is defined and the subject matter to which it relates fully treated in the title Criminal Law §§ 73–78 [16 C.J. p 111 note 91–p 119 note 79]. It has been said that "attempt" is an indefinite term,[23] but one well understood both in law and by people generally.[24] As commonly used, the word implies an act or effort,[25] an actual deed done in pursuance and in furtherance of a design,[26] an exercise of physical force directed to some definite end,[27] or a physical act of causation,[28] an exertion,[29] an intent formed,[30] a purpose[31] or expression of opinion,[32] something more than a mere declaration,[33] a remote effort or indirect measure taken with intent to effect an object,[34] and the possibility of the act attempted.[35] It has been said that it signifies both the act and the intent with which the act is done,[36] and carries within itself the idea of an uncompleted act[37] The term generally means an act, effort, an endeavor or exertion tending toward the accomplishment of a purpose which exceeds a mere intent but falls short of an execution of it;[38]

an ineffectual act.[39]

The term may be employed also as meaning an attack;[40] an experiment;[41] an offer;[42] a trial;[43] a trial or physical effort to do a particular thing.[44]

Other terms compared and distinguished. "Attempt" is frequently used in statutes as synonymous with "intent."[45] It is, however, more comprehensive than the word "intent;"[46] the distinction between an "intent" and an "attempt" to do a thing is that the former implies the purpose only, while the latter implies both the purpose and an actual effort to carry that purpose into execution.[47] The word has also been distinguished from "preparation," it being said that there is a clear line of distinction between mere acts of preparation and acts which rise to the dignity of attempts,[48] but that, in a certain connection, statutes have defined "attempt" in terms of specific acts, the purpose being to formulate a comprehensive definition broad enough to include acts in the nature of preparation superseding the narrower conception of the meaning of the word "attempt."[49] It has also been compared with and distinguished from "design," "execution,"[50] "purpose,"[51] and "solicitation."[52]

Phrases: "Attempt at an attempt,"[53] "attempt at fraud,"[54] "attempt of the trustees . . . to add $500,000 to the permanent endowment fund,"[55] "attempt to cause insubordination,"[56] "attempt to commence an action,"[57] "attempt to contest,"[58] "attempt to defeat the provisions of this will,"[59] "attempt to defraud,"[60] "attempt to induce violation of lawful duty,"[61] "attempt to influence the decision of a court,"[62] " 'attempt' to marry,"[63] "attempt to monopolize,"[64] "attempt to sell the stock,"[65] "guilty of attempt;"[66] also, "attempts, and but too successful,"[67] and "attempts to commit felonies."[68]

honesty of any attendant or attendants,"[3] and "usual medical attendant."[4]

ATTENTAT. Latin, he attempts. In the civil and canon law, anything wrongfully innovated or "attempted" in a suit by an inferior judge, or judge a quo, pending an appeal.[5]

ATTENTION. Consideration; exclusive or especial consideration; notice; observant care; the act or state of attending or heeding.[6] It has been said that the word implies animation and hence is not referable to an inanimate object.[7]

Phrases: "The same shall have prompt attention,"[8] and "your bill . . . shall have attention."[9]

ATTENUATE. To make thin; to make slender or fine; reduce in density; dilute;[10] to make thin or slender as by mechanical or chemical action; to make thin or slender or less consistent; to render less viscid or dense; to rarefy.[11]

Phrase: "Attenuated discharge passages."[12]

ATTERMINARE. In old English law, to put off to a succeeding term; to prolong the time of payment of a debt.[13]

ATTERMOIEMENT. In canon law, a making terms, a composition, as with creditors.[14]

ATTEST. The term comes from the two Latin words "ad" and "testari," which mean literally to witness to or to bear witness; and it has been said that the notion associated with the word, both in its technical and nontechnical use, is that of observation and subscription;[15] and that, although sometimes characterized as not having a sufficiently definite signification,[16] yet it naturally takes some of its force from context and purpose, although "attest" inherently betokens a solemn personal act of authentication of genuineness.[17] In the present tense, the word has been defined as meaning to act as a witness to, to bear witness to a fact, to certify to the verity of a copy of a public document formally by signature, to make a solemn declaration in words or writing to support a fact, or to signify by subscription of his name that the signer has witnessed the execution of the particular instrument;[18] to affirm to be true or genuine;[19] to bear witness to;[20] to certify,[21] to subscribe;[22] to testify;[23] to vouch for;[24] to witness;[25] to witness the execution of a written instrument, at the request of him who makes it, and subscribing the same as a witness.[26] It has been said that the word is appropriately used for the affirmation of persons in their official capacity to test the truth of a writing,[27] and that it is the technical word by which, in the practice of many states, a certifying officer gives assurance to the verity of a copy.[28]

Phrases: "Attest: A. R. McDonald, City Clerk,"[29] and "attest by writing;"[30] also "attests a protest;"[31] and also, used participially, "attesting witness."[32]

Attested

In the past tense, the word has been held to mean authenticated;[33] certified;[34] signed in the presence of;[35] verified;[36] witnessed;[37] and, when used with reference to judicial writings or copies thereof, the word seems to have a legal meaning, which is an authentication by the clerk of the court so as to make them receivable in evidence.[38] "Attested" has been distinguished from "executed"[39] and "proved."[40]

Phrases: "A true and attested copy,"[41] "'attested' account,"[42] "attested and subscribed,"[43] "attested by at least two witnesses,"[44] "attested by the signature of a legal voter,"[45] "'attested copy' of the citation,"[46] "attested in his presence,"[47] "attested note,"[48] "attested order,"[49] "by deed or will attested,"[50] "entries were attested,"[51] "reports . . . attested by the signatures . . . of the directors,"[52] and "such bonds . . . attested by the City Clerk."[53]

ATTESTATIO. Law Latin, an attesting, attestation, testimony.[54]

ATTESTATION. "Attestation," as the term applies to a deed, is defined in the title Deeds § 35 [18 C.J. p 193 note 71–p 195 note 5]; and as it applies to the execution of a will, in the title Wills §§ 182–197 [68 C.J. p 671 note 8–p 713 note 88]. In its more general applications, the word has been defined as meaning an act by which one certifies the truth of a fact;[55] an act of authentication;[56] a signature;[57] a solemn or official declaration in support of a fact;[58] a subscription;[59] a verification;[60] the act of witnessing an instrument of writing, at the request of the party making the same, and subscribing it as a witness;[61] the act of witnessing the actual execution of a paper, and subscribing one's name as a witness to that fact;[62] the act of witnessing the

(1) A person who signs his name to an instrument to prove it, and for the purpose of identifying the maker or makers—Century D., quoted in International Trust Co. v. Anthony, 101 P. 781, 783, 45 Colo 474, 22 L.R.A (N S) 1003, 16 Ann Cas. 1087.

(2) One who sees a writing executed or hears it acknowledged, and, at the request of the party, thereupon signs his name as a witness—Luper v. Werts, 23 P. 850, 855, 19 Or. 122.

(3) One who, upon being required by the parties to an instrument, signs his name to it to prove it, and for the purpose of identification.—Bouvier L D., quoted in Hannah v. Brereton, 23 Que Super 98, 105

(4) A subscribing witness—In re Reid's Estate, 153 N.W. 324, 325, 130 Minn. 256—6 C.J. p 555 note 16.

Under the common law a subscribing or attesting witness was an outside party called in to stand as a witness between the parties thereto. signature of an instrument and subscribing the name of the witness in testimony of such fact;[63] the authentication of an instrument by the requisite number of witnesses;[64] the subscription by a person of his name to a written instrument to signify that the same was executed in his presence, or that it is correct.[65] It has been said that the word implies the presence of some person who stands by but is not a party to the transaction.[66]

In its secondary or technical sense, it has been held to mean the certification by the keeper of a record of the verity of the copy,[67] being the act of the officer, as disclosed by his certificate, and not the act of the maker of the instrument;[68] and in this sense it has been said that the word implies that everything essential to the completeness and validity of the instrument so attested has been done;[69] and that it includes the word "copy," although not expressly used.[70]

"Attestation" has been distinguished from "acknowledgment" (see Acknowledgments § 1, 1 C J S p 778 note 6), "execution,"[71] "proof,"[72] and "subscription."[73]

Attestation clause That clause wherein the witnesses certify that the instrument has been executed before them, and the manner of the execution of the same.[74] The attestation clause may consist of a simple word such as "witness," "attest," or "test," or there may be no words of attestation at all, save the signature of the witness.[75]

ATTESTOR. One who attests or vouches for.[76]

Attestor of a cautioner. In Scotch practice, a person who attests the sufficiency of a cautioner, and agrees to become "subsidiarie" liable for the debt.[77]

ATTIC. All the rooms immediately below the roof.[78]

Phrase: "Attic story."[79]

ATTILAMENTUM. In old English law, tackling or "tackel;" rigging, furniture, equipment.[80]

ATTILE. In old English law, the rigging or furniture of a ship[81]

ATTINCTA. Law Latin, an attaint, stain, or blackening; a conviction or finding of guilty of some offense.[82]

ATTINCTUS. Literally, stained or blackened.[83]

ATTITUDE. Any condition of things or the relation of persons viewed as the expression of, or as affecting feeling, opinion, intentions, etc.;[84] position as indicating action, feeling, or mood.[85]

Phrases: "Attitude of claiming an adverse interest,"[86] "attitude of mind,"[87] and "the jury will not consider anything . . . but the attitude."[88]

ATTORN. "Attorn," as the word is used in the law of landlord and tenant, will be defined in the title Landlord and Tenant §§ 277–279 [35 C.J. p 1247 note 97–p 1249 note 40]. It has been said that the verb "attorn," among other meanings, may mean to transfer or turn over to another;[89] to turn over; to transfer to another money or goods; to assign to some particular use or service;[90] to consent to a transfer.[91]

Phrases: "Claims to have 'attorned,'"[92] and "plaintiff had 'attorned.'"[93]

ATTORNAMENTUM. Law Latin, attornment.[94]

ATTORNARE or ATTURNARE. Law Latin, to turn; to exchange; to give one thing in place of another. In feudal law, to attorn; to transfer or turn over.[95] In old English practice, to attorn; to put in one's place; to appoint a substitute or attorney.[96]

ATTORNATIO. Law Latin, an attornment.[97]

ATTORNATO FACIENDO VEL RECIPIENDO. An obsolete writ, which commanded a sheriff or steward of a county court or hundred court to receive and admit an attorney to appear for the person who owed suit of court.[98]

ATTORNATUS. One who is attorned, or put in the place of another; a substitute; hence an attorney.[99]

ATTORNATUS FERE IN OMNIBUS PERSONAM DOMINI REPRESENTAT.[1]

ATTORNE. Law French, in old English law, an attorney.[2]

ATTORNEY. The word, both in its broadest sense as signifying one appointed to act for another, and in the narrow sense signifying one employed to manage a cause in litigation, has been defined and, in the latter sense, the subject-matter fully treated in Attorney and Client post.

Phrases: "'Acting as' attorney,"[3] "agent, attorney, or proxy,"[4] "an attorney employed in the case,"[5] "any attorney . . . specially appointed by the Attorney General,"[6] "a party 'or his attorney,'"[7] "appears of record as the attorney,"[8] "attorney at law" (see Attorney and Client § 1), "attorney for himself as petitioning creditor,"[9] "attorney general" (see Attorney General § 1), "attorney in fact" (see Agency § 4), "attorney is answerable,"[10] "attorney of record" (see Attorney and Client § 3), "attorney or counselor,"[11] "by any attorney of any court of record,"[12] "city attorney,"[13] "embezzlement by agent, attorney, clerk, or servant,"[14] "his agent or attorney at law,"[15] "holds himself out to be an attorney,"[16]

I. DEFINITIONS

§ 1. Attorney and Attorney at Law

Attorney, in its broad sense signifies an agent, but in general use is construed as meaning attorney at law.

The word "attorney" signifies, in its broadest sense, a substitute or agent,[1] one who is appointed or authorized to act in the place of or for another.[2] It is not necessarily limited to an attorney in fact;[3] on the contrary, when not coupled with any qualifying expression, the word is usually construed as meaning attorney at law.[4] The term will be used in this sense in this Title.

An attorney at law is an officer in a court of justice who is employed by a party in a cause to manage the same for him.[5]

§ 2. Client

A client is one who seeks advice of an attorney or retains him to prosecute or defend a suit.

A client is one who applies to a lawyer or counselor for advice and direction in a question of law, or commits his cause to his management in prosecuting a claim or defending against a suit in a court of justice,[6] one who retains the attorney, is responsible to him for his fees, and to whom the attorney is responsible for the management of the suit,[7] one who communicates facts to an attorney expecting professional advice.[8]

§ 3. Other Terms

a. Advocate
b. Barrister
c. Counsel or counselor
d. Lawyer
e. Proctor
f. Solicitor
g. Practice of law

a. Advocate

An advocate is a person learned in law and duly admitted to practice.

An advocate is a person learned in the law and duly admitted to practice who assists his client with advice and pleads for him in open court.[9] In the civil and ecclesiastical law an advocate is an officer of the court learned in the law who is engaged by a suitor to maintain or defend his cause.[10]

In admiralty practice, counsel eo nomine were not known, the functions of counsel in courts of common law and equity being performed in civil and maritime courts by advocates.[11]

b. Barrister

A barrister is a person entitled to practice as an advocate or counsel in superior courts in England.

In England and her colonies a barrister is a person entitled to practice as an advocate or counsel in the superior courts.[12]

c. Counsel or Counselor

Counsel means an advocate, counselor, or pleader, a member of the legal profession.

The word "counsel" means an advocate, counselor, or pleader; one who assists his client with advice and pleads for him in open court.[13] A counselor is an advocate or barrister; a member of the legal profession whose special function is to give counsel or advice as to the legal aspects of judicial controversies or their preparation and management, and to appear in court for the conduct of trials, or the argument of causes or presentation of motions, or any other legal business that takes him into the presence of the court.[14]

d. Lawyer

A lawyer is one skilled in the law; "lawyer" is the synonym of "attorney."

A lawyer is defined as one skilled in the law.[15] The term is synonymous with "attorney."[16]

e. Proctor

A proctor is an attorney in the admiralty and ecclesiastical courts.

A proctor is an attorney in the admiralty and ecclesiastical courts.[17]

f. Solicitor

A solicitor is a person prosecuting or defending suits in courts of chancery.

A solicitor is a person whose business it is to be employed in the care and management of suits depending in courts of chancery.[18] In the great majority of the states of the Union, where law and equity are both administered by the same court, it has naturally come about that the two offices of attorney at law and solicitor in chancery have practically been consolidated, although in the federal equity practice the term "solicitor" is in general use; but in some states the office of solicitor in chancery is a distinct and separate office from that of attorney at law.[19]

g. Practice of Law

Practice of law is not confined to performing services in a proceeding in the court, but also includes preparation of legal instruments, etc.

While a statute, which declares that the performance of certain acts shall be included within the meaning of practicing law, may not be invalid,[20] a statute enumerating and penalizing certain acts when performed by a person not licensed to practice law has been held not to define for all purposes "practice of law" and to take the matter out of the control and supervision of the court.[21] The general meaning of the term, "practice law" or "practice of law," is of common knowledge, although the boundaries of its definition may be indefinite as to some transactions.[22] As generally understood, it is the doing or performing of services in a court of justice, in any matter depending therein, throughout its various stages, and in conformity with the adopted rules of procedure;[23] but it is not confined to performing services in an action or proceeding pending in courts of justice,[24] and, in a larger sense, it includes legal advice and counsel, and the preparation of legal instruments and contracts by which legal rights are secured, although such matter may or may not be pending in a court.[25] To "practice law" is to

"Practice of law under modern conditions consists in no small part of work performed outside of any court and having no immediate relation to proceedings in court. It embraces conveyancing, the giving of legal advice on a large variety of subjects, and the preparation and execution of legal instruments covering an extensive field of business and trust relations and other affairs Although these transactions may have no direct connection with court proceedings, they are always subject to become involved in litigation They require in many aspects a high degree of legal skill, a wide experience with men and affairs, and great capacity for adaptation to difficult and complex situations. These customary functions of an attorney or counselor at law . . . bear an intimate relation to the administration of justice by the courts. No valid distinction, so far as concerns the questions set forth in the order, can be drawn between that part of the work of the lawyer which involves appearance in court and that part which involves advice and drafting of instruments in his office . . . It is of importance to the welfare of the public that these manifold customary functions be performed by persons possessed of adequate learning and skill, of sound moral character, and acting at all times under the heavy trust obligation to clients which rests upon all attorneys"—In re Opinion of the Justices, (Mass.) 194 N.E 313, 317, quoted in Rhode Island Bar Ass'n v. (22) Foreclosure of mortgages by advertisement, where an attorney's fee is included in the costs, constitutes "practice of law"—In re Otterness, supra

(23) An industrial commission would be prohibited from entertaining the appearance of practice before it on rehearing proceedings of any person other than an attorney at law duly admitted to practice, since one appearing before the commission in a representative capacity after claimant first receives notice of the disallowance of his claim is engaged in "practice of law"—Goodman v Beall, 200 N E 470, 130 Ohio St. 427

(24) Claim adjuster who contracted to enforce, secure, settle, adjust, or compromise a claim arising out of the death of a child through a railroad's dynamite torch, and who was required to examine the facts and to advise the parents regarding the liability of the railroad, and who, in adjusting claims, advised clients respecting their rights and liabilities as a matter of law, was engaged in unauthorized "practice of law"—Meunier v Bernich, (La.App) 170 So 567.

(25) Claim adjuster's contract to enforce, secure, settle, adjust, or compromise parents' claim for death of their child, under which contract the adjuster was required to examine the facts and to advise the parents regarding the liability of the railroad whose dynamite caused the death, was held to be illegal and against public policy, on the ground that the adjuster attempted to perform services which only an attorney was entitled to render thus illegally practicing law, and hence the adjuster could not recover for services rendered—Meunier v Bernich, supra

(26) One who renders an opinion as to the proper interpretation of a statute, or gives information as to what judicial or quasi judicial tribunals are deciding, and receives pay for it, is, to that extent, "practicing law"—Mandelbaum v Gilbert & Barker Mfg. Co, 290 N Y S 462, 160 Misc 656

(27) "Practice of law" includes the drawing for others of complicated legal instruments requiring more legal knowledge than is possessed by the average layman, even though such instruments may to some extent be incident to business such as that usually conducted by trust companies—Cain v. Merchants Nat. Bank & Trust Co of Fargo, (N D) 268 N W. 719.

31. Acts or services held not to constitute practice of law

(1) Business conducted by an attorney under the name of an association, whereby the association supplied to subscribers emergency road, garage, and medical service, provided maps and touring information, furnished accident insurance, and paid for legal advice and for defending members when charged with the violation of automobile laws and regulations and for defending suits for property damage, and furnished a magazine containing a list of attorneys which members could engage, but also permitted members to employ any unlisted attorney, was held not to be engaged in the "practice of law"—In re Thibodeau, (Mass.) 3 N E (2d) 749, 106 A.L.R. 542

(2) Occasional drafting of simple deeds and other legal instruments when not conducted as an occupation or yielding a substantial income, gratuitous furnishing of legal aid to poor and unfortunate without means in pursuit of any civil remedy, as a matter of charity, search of records of realty to ascertain what may be disclosed without giving opinion or advice as to the legal effect of what is found, work of an accountant dissociated from legal service, and other kindred pursuits, do not constitute the "practice of law."—In re Opinion of the Justices, (Mass) 194 N E 313

(3) Preparation by a trust company, acting through an officer not authorized to practice law, of single will naming the trust company as executor has been held not to violate the statute prohibiting unauthorized practice of law—In re Umble's Estate, 177 A. 340, 117 Pa Super 15

(4) The drafting of simple legal papers, such as deeds, mortgages, etc., by filling out printed blanks, by one not holding himself out as a member of the bar is not practicing law.—Childs v. Smeltzer, 18 Pa Dist & Co. 39.

(5) Statute prohibiting the practice of law by laymen does not preclude realty brokers from drafting deeds, mortgages, or other contracts growing out of their business transactions as the practice of law by the drafting legal instruments is prohibited only when the drafting thereof is not connected with the immediate business of the person preparing them who, although not a member of the bar, holds himself out as specially qualified—Childs v. Smeltzer, 171 A. 883, 315 Pa. 9.

(6) Collection agent who was not an attorney was held not to be engaged in the "practice of law," where a claim was assigned to him under an agreement that, if he could not collect the claim without suit, he was to hire an attorney at his expense and sue in his own name, and, if the collection was made, he was to remit the balance to the assignor, after deducting costs and a percentage for his services—Cohn v. Thompson, 16 P.(2d) 364, 128 Cal. App. 783

(7) Statute prohibiting commencement, conduct, or defense of an action by a person not the party concerned, unless admitted to practice law under state supreme court rules, is inapplicable to a layman, merely agreeing to employ counsel to collect a debt due to another by litigation—Clifford v. Wilcox, 27 P.(2d) 722, 175 Wash 513

(8) Agreement, whereby a client

II. THE OFFICE OF ATTORNEY

A. ADMISSION TO PRACTICE

§ 4. In General

a. Nature of office

b. Nature of right to practice

a. Nature of Office

An attorney is an officer of the court with an obligation to the public as well as to his clients

An attorney does not hold an office or public trust, in the constitutional or statutory sense of that term,[32] but is an officer of the court.[33] He is, however, in a sense an officer of the state, with an obligation to the courts and to the public no less authorized a third person to make arrangements with a named attorney relative to court proceedings and agreed to pay such third person from moneys received for services as adviser, was held not on its face violative of a statute prohibiting persons not attorneys from soliciting employment as, or furnishing, attorneys, or holding themselves out as attorneys.—Cagliardi v Hoffman, 284 N.Y.S. 81, 246 App Div. 753.

(9) Advertisements concerning services furnished by a trust company in connection with trusts in wills, not offering legal advice, have been held not to advise the public that the trust company maintained a place for the practice of law, in violation of the statute.—In re Umble's Estate, 177 A. 340, 117 Pa Super 15

(10) Suggestions by accountants as to how a corporation could reduce its franchise tax has been held not to be practice of law.—Elfenbein v. Luckenbach Terminals, 166 A. 91, 111 N J Law 67.

(11) Assisting workman or his dependents in submitting a compensation claim is not "practice of law" —Goodman v. Beall, 200 N E 470, 130 Ohio St. 427.

(12) Patent attorney's contract, to protect a client's interest by employing counsel when necessary and prosecuting an infringement suit, was not illegal as an agreement to "practice law," although the patent attorney was not an attorney at law —Schroeder v. Wheeler, 14 P (2d) 903, 126 Cal App. 367.

(13) The act of an attorney in fact or an agent in merely signing a notice of appeal on behalf of his principal is not a violation of the statutes regulating the practice of law —Tomondong v. Ikezaki, 32 Hawaii 12.

(14) Practice of a notary and bank employee, acting in effect as a lawyer in connection with the execution of a will, is strongly condemned — In re Flynn's Estate, 253 N.Y.S. 638, 42 Misc 7.

(15) Act of an agent of a bonding company in preparing and executing the bond for his principal, where he merely performs the duties of agent, does not constitute "practice of law." —State ex rel Wright v Barlow, (Neb) 268 N.W. 95.

(16) One who acts merely as an amanuensis in preparing an assignment of a judgment is not engaged in the "practice of law"—State ex rel. Wright v. Barlow, supra

(17) Person who is not a member of the bar is entitled to prepare instruments, such as simple deeds, mortgages, promissory notes, and bills of sale, when such instruments are incident to transactions in which such person is interested, provided no charge is made therefor.—Cain v Merchants Nat Bank & Trust Co. of Fargo, (N D) 268 N W 719

"Investigation" of a case does not necessitate the "practice of law," "investigation" being synonymous with "detection," since it is not part of a lawyer's function to ferret out evidence which may be helpful to his client in prosecution of such client's claim.—Meunier v. Bernich, (La App.) 170 So 567.

First duty not to clients

"Counsel must remember that they, too, are officers of the courts, administrators of justice, oath-bound servants of society, that their first duty is not to their clients, as many suppose, but is to the administration of justice, that to this their clients' success is wholly subordinate, that their conduct ought to and must be scrupulously observant of law and ethics; and to the extent that they fail therein, they injure themselves, wrong their brothers at the bar, bring reproach upon an honorable profession, betray the courts, and defeat justice"—U S. v. Frank, (D C. N J) 53 F (2d) 128, 129, reversed on other grounds (C C A) Loughlin v. U S, 57 F (2d) 1030, and reversed on other grounds in part Pearse v. U S, 59 F (2d) 513—In re Kelly, (D C Mont) 243 F. 696, 705

Public has a deep and vital interest in his integrity—Berman v Coakley, 187 N E 667, 243 Mass. 348.

Conflict of duties

(1) In case of conflict between attorney's duty to client and that to court, his duty to court must prevail.—State v. Barto, 232 N.W. 553, 202 Wis. 329

(2) Where duties to court and profession conflict with those an attorney deems due a client from friendship, he should abandon the relation of attorney—State v Woodville, 108 So 309, 161 La. 125

Accepting employment entails duty to courts and faithful performance of services, and it is a dereliction of duty for an attorney to abandon a cause on appeal and fail to favor the court with a brief—Lammer v. Smith, 19 P (2d) 825, 130 Cal App. 98

Oath shows first duty is to public

Oath of an attorney to support constitutions and obey laws shows intent to charge him with public function, which is superior to private interests of client—Petition of Board of Law Examiners, Examination of 1926, 210 N W. 710, 191 Wis. 359.

Duty to know reports and documents are true and correct

(1) Attorneys have a duty to know that the contents of reports and documents are true and correct, and a presentation is a representation that this duty has been performed—U S v Ford, (D C Mont) 9 F (2d) 990—Sparks v. Commonwealth, 8 S. W (2d) 397, 225 Ky. 334

(2) Conduct of attorneys in permitting their names to be signed to a brief which they did not read has been held highly improper—In re Glauberman, 152 A. 650, 107 N J Eq. 334.

Suits in forma pauperis

(1) It is the duty of attorneys concerned in applications to sue in forma pauperis to ascertain so far as they are able by investigation that applicant is entitled to the favorable consideration of the court, and that all the facts calling for the exercise of the court's discretion in behalf of applicant exist—Osiel v. Osiel, (N J Ch) 62 A. 549.

(2) Attorneys, requiring a county to bear the expense of an appeal of an impecunious person, owe a duty to the court to appear and point out by brief or oral argument wherein their client has not had a fair trial—Flores v State, 4 P.(2d) 334, 39 Ariz 106—Fogal v. State, 3 P.(2d) 1053, 39 Ariz. 55 (first case), followed in 3 P.(2d) 1053, 39 Ariz. 57 (second case), and Johnson v. State, 3 P.(2d) 1054, 39 Ariz. 57.

Client having governmental powers

Attorney's official status on behalf of client with governmental powers does not make him a "public official" within a statute relating to holding over of the office—People ex rel Dawson v Knox, 247 N Y S 731, 231 App Div. 490, affirmed 196 N.E 582, 267 N Y 565

State may attach conditions to right to practice

Since the right to practice law is created by statute, and an attorney practices under a license from the state, the state may attach such conditions to the license as it believes necessary for the protection of the public—Yeiser v Dysart, 45 S.Ct. 399, 267 U S 540, 69 L Ed 775, affirming In re Yeiser, 192 N W. 953, 110 Neb 65.

merits only,[36] to aid any effort under the court's direction to root out corruption and fraud,[37] and also to devote his ability, skill, and diligence along ethical and professional lines to the interests of his client,[38] and to refrain from entering into any alliance or incurring any obligation connected with the litigation in which he is engaged as counsel that would place him in a position where his personal interests would be adverse to those of his client.[39]

b. Nature of Right to Practice

Right to practice law is not a natural or constitutional right, but is in the nature of a privilege or franchise.

The right to practice law is not a natural or constitutional right,[40] nor an absolute right[41] or a right de jure,[42] but is a privilege or franchise.[43]

The right to practice law is not "property,"[44] nor in any sense a "contract,"[45] nor a "privilege or immunity,"[46] within the constitutional meaning of those terms. It cannot be assigned or inherited, but must be earned by hard study and good conduct.[47]

§ 5. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions and Rules of Court

a. As to admission of attorneys
b. Miscellaneous provisions

a. As to Admission of Attorneys

Generally, the legislature may prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for admission to the bar, but cannot deprive courts of the right to make other, or additional, rules pertaining thereto.

Notwithstanding the jurisdiction and power to admit applicants to practice law is judicial and vested solely in the courts as hereafter shown (see infra § 6), it has been generally conceded that the legislature may, subject to constitutional limitations, prescribe reasonable rules and regulations for admissions to the bar which will be followed by the courts,[48] and this power to prescribe qualifica-

Declaratory of inherent power of court

Statute declaring that the supreme court shall, by general or special rules, regulate admission of attorneys to practice in state courts is declaratory of power inherent in the supreme court to control and supervise the practice of law generally.—Rhode Island Bar Ass'n v Automobile Service Ass'n, (R I) 179 A 139.

Legal services not connected with administration of law in court proceedings

(1) Legislature may establish whatever qualifications it chooses for those permitted to render any type of legal service which has nothing to do with the administration of the law in court proceedings—State v. Cannon, 240 N.W. 441, 206 Wis 374.

(2) Legislature in punishing practice of law except by licensed attorneys is empowered to authorize licensed realty brokers to draw deeds, bonds, mortgages, leases, releases, agreements and assignments.—Mor-

tions cannot be irrevocably surrendered.[49] However, the legislature may not impose unreasonable rules or deprive the courts of their inherent power to prescribe other rules and conditions of admission to practice,[50] nor take from the courts the right and duty of actually making orders admitting applicants,[51] and the admitted power of congress to prescribe qualifications for attorneys in the federal courts cannot be exercised as a means for the infliction of punishment for the past conduct of such persons.[52] The authority of the legislature is denied by some courts on the ground that courts have the sole right to prescribe for themselves the qualifications of their ministers of justice, and the rules and regulations for their admission, without interference by a coördinate branch of the government.[53] It has been held, however, that a mere declaration of the effect to be given to a purely judicial act of the supreme court in directing the admission of an attorney at law to practice before it is not a legislative interference with judicial power.[54]

Courts may make reasonable rules and regulations for admission to the bar,[55] and may prescribe qualifications in addition to those provided by statute.[56] However, a court rule requiring the employment of local counsel by counsel of record, not maintaining an office in the county, has been held invalid,[57] as the privilege conferred on a person admitted to practice as attorney is state wide and cannot be abridged by local court rule.[58]

b. Miscellaneous Provisions

The validity of certain other statutory provisions has been before the courts for adjudication.

A statute authorizing the court of appeals to adopt rules regulating practice of law and providing for procedure for disciplining attorneys was held not unconstitutional.[59] A clause excepting, from a statute defining practice of law, laymen's activities without resort to court proceedings, in

Qualifications necessary to protect public

Legislature has power to exact of those desiring to practice law such qualifications as, in the legislature's judgment, are necessary to protect citizens from becoming unconscious victims of dishonesty or incompetence—State v. Cannon, 240 N.W. 441, 206 Wis 374

Legislation forbidding practice of law relating to the performance of functions of attorney before a court by individuals other than members of the bar would be within competency of the legislature, and crimes might be established as well as civil remedies for infraction of such prohibitions—In re Opinion of the Justices, (Mass) 194 N E 313.

(2) Legislature has no power to enact legislation designed to permit practice of law relating to performance of functions of attorney before court by individuals other than by members of the bar, since permission to practice law is within exclusive cognizance of the judicial department.—In re Opinion of the Justices, supra

(3) Legislature may make exceptions to prohibitory provisions with regard to practice of law, but permission cannot thereby be conferred to practice law, except subject to the judicial department—In re Opinion of the Justices, supra.

(4) A joint legislative resolution requiring the court to grant a license to certain individuals to practice law cannot avoid the requirements of a general statute, Code (1913) c 119 § 1 (§ 4699), and rules of court made pursuant thereto, regulating the granting of license and prescribing study and degree of preparation in order to entitle applicant to a license —In re Adkins, 98 S E. 888, 83 W. § 6. Jurisdiction to Admit

a. In general
b. Particular courts or boards

a. In General

Power to admit applicants to practice law is judicial and vested solely in the courts Power is not an arbitrary or despotic one.

Attorneys being officers of the court (see supra § 4 a), the power to admit applicants to practice law is judicial and not legislative, and is vested in the courts only.[61] However, this power to admit attorneys is not an arbitrary and despotic one, to be exercised at the pleasure of the court, or from passion, prejudice, or personal hostility; but it is the duty of the court to exercise and regulate it by a sound and just judicial discretion.[62]

b. Particular Courts or Boards

Power to admit to practice is sometimes vested in the supreme court or courts of appeal and sometimes in courts of general jurisdiction.

In many jurisdictions the power to admit to practice is exercised by courts of record of general jurisdiction,[63] but exclusive power to admit applicants to the bar is sometimes vested by the legislature in the supreme court[64] or other court of appeal[65]

§ 7. Capacity and Qualifications

a. In general
b. Good moral character
c Citizenship and residence
d. Women and minors

a. In General

Compliance with local statutory provisions and rules of court is prerequisite to the practice of law.

The right to admission to practice is governed in every jurisdiction by the local statutory and constitutional provisions and rules of court and compliance with these requirements is prerequisite to the practice of law.[68] The ultimate purpose of all regulations of the admission of attorneys is to assure the courts the assistance of advocates of ability, learning, and sound character and to protect the public from incompetent and dishonest practitioners.[69]

In the federal courts, the qualifications for admission are prescribed by court rules, and, generally, a member of the bar of a state is admissible on motion on a proper showing of compliance with the rules.

b. Good Moral Character

Possession of a good moral character is universally required as a condition to the right to admission to practice.

The possession of a good moral character is universally required as a condition precedent to the right to admission to practice.[70] This includes at

Good character, not reputation, required

Applicant for license to practice law is required to show good moral "character," or what he really is, as distinguished from good "reputation," or the opinion generally entertained of him—In re Weinstein, 42 P (2d) 744, 150 Or. 1.

Lack of proper conception of ethics

A man of mature years and of good general reputation, who, as found by board of law examiners, has failed to conceive the nature of the duties of attorney, and has no proper conception of the ethics of the profession, having solicited business for a member of the bar, etc, should not be admitted to practice law—In re Bowers, 200 S W 821, 138 Tenn. 662

Facts held to negative good moral character

(1) Facts disclosing applicant had been disbarred in another state, convicted of forgery, and adjudged in contempt for practicing law without a license—In re Garland, 28 P (2d) 354, 219 Cal. 661.

(2) Concealing former application for admission and withdrawal thereof because of objections to his moral character—In re Wells, 163 P. 657, 174 Cal 467.

(3) Convictions of assault and carrying concealed weapons; and denial of custody of child in divorce proceedings as not a fit and suitable person to have such custody—In re Farmer, 131 S.E 661, 191 N C 235.

(4) Indictment for felony—State v Podell, 207 N W. 709, 189 Wis 457.

(5) Making false statements in affidavits accompanying application —Spears v. State Bar of California, 294 P. 697, 211 Cal. 133, 72 A L R 923.

(6) Obtaining a loan by concealing material facts, and assisting another attorney before admission by advising witnesses to evade giving honest answers—In re Wells, 163 P. 657, 174 Cal. 467.

(7) Obtaining goods by false pre-least common honesty.[71] The standard of personal and professional integrity which should be applied to persons admitted to practice law is not satisfied by such conduct as merely enables them to escape the penalties of the criminal law,[72] and an applicant may be rejected for want of good moral character although guilty only of acts which would not be cause for disbarment or suspension.[73]

Certificate as to good character of applicant should be given by practicing attorneys only from personal knowledge or after painstaking inquiry into the matter.[74]

c. Citizenship and Residence

A necessary qualification for admission to practice, generally, is that the applicant be a citizen of the United States. Residence in the state is sometimes required.

A necessary qualification for admission to practice, generally, is that the applicant must be a citizen of the United States,[75] as an alien cannot well take the oath required of attorneys and counselors.[76] In some states, however, one who has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States and who possesses the other necessary qualifications may be admitted by virtue of statutory provisions,[77] but an attorney, admitted under such conditions, is not admissible to the bar of a district court of the United States where, after such admission to the bar of the state court, his petition for admission to citizenship was denied.[78]

Residence. Although it has been held that an applicant, although not a resident, may be admitted if he possesses all the other qualifications,[79] bona fide residence in the state is an essential condition for original admission to the bar in some jurisdictions, with actual domicile and an established place of business.[80] The question of what shall be the required connection between residence and the practice of law is primarily for the state where the practice is sought to be conducted,[81] and residence within the meaning of a statute requiring residence for a certain period prior to admission means the abode where one actually lives, and not a mere naked legal residence.[82]

d. Women and Minors

There is a conflict as to the right of women to be admitted to the practice of law. Generally, a minor is not eligible for admission to the bar.

A woman has no right at common law, or under the constitution of the United States, or under statutes in some jurisdictions, to practice law, and, except in those jurisdictions where special statutory provisions have been made, rendering her eligible, it has been held that she cannot be admitted to the bar as an attorney,[83] although there

(1) Under the treaty of Paris providing that all Spanish subjects remaining in the islands and not preserving their allegiance to Spain by certain acts shall be held to have renounced it and to have adopted the nationality of the territory, one who left the islands, although for temporary purposes, has been held to have lost his right to claim citizenship and with it the right to practice law in the Archipelago—Bosque v. U.S., 28 S.Ct. 501, 209 U.S. 91, 52 L.Ed. 698, affirming 1 Philippine 88

(2) A child under parental authority whose father made no declaration of intention to retain Spanish citizenship under such treaty is a citizen and qualified to enroll for the bar examination—Matter of Arnaiz, 9 Philippine 705, 6 Off.Gaz. 549

(3) The son of a Spaniard born in Cuba, but who was of age on April 11, 1899, and made no declaration of intention to claim Spanish citizenship is, likewise, a citizen of the Philippine Islands and entitled to enroll for the bar examination—Matter of Villapol, 9 Philippine 706, 6 Off.Gaz. 550

Court cannot make exceptions to statute

An alien applicant for admission to the bar, who had filed his application and taken his examination before the amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 275, by St.(1921) p. 538, permitting citizens to be admitted to the bar and providing that aliens previously admitted to practice must complete their naturalization within one year, or have their certificates revoked, became effective on July 29, 1921, is not entitled to have an order entered admitting him as of a day prior to the effective date of the amendment, since the statute covers his case, and the court cannot write exceptions therein—Petition of Harrison, 211 P. 26, 59 Cal.App. 539

Statute not modified by general statute

Statute permitting one declaring his intention to become a citizen to be admitted has been held not modified by a later statute generally prescribing regulations as to admission to practice law—Telegdi v. is authority to the contrary.[84] Objections to the admission of women to the bar, aside from the fact that it has no warrant under the common law, lay in the fact that an attorney is a quasi-officer of the court and an admission of women to that office would mean that they were eligible to all other offices,[85] and there has been raised a further and stronger objection to the admission of married women on the ground of their disabilities arising from coverture.[86]

In statutes authorizing the admission of attorneys generally and which provide that any "person" or "citizen" having certain prescribed qualifications may be admitted on application, the words "person" and "citizen" have been held not to include women, even though there may be a general provision in the statute law that words importing the masculine gender shall be construed to include the feminine.[87]

Nevertheless, the legislature has abundant power to provide for the admission of women to the bar of the state, and by specific statutory provisions women are now entitled to practice in the supreme court of the United States and in the highest courts of many of the states.[88]

Minors The general rule is that a minor is not eligible to admission to the bar; most of the statutes provide that the applicant shall be twenty-one years of age, and it seems that this is a necessary requisite even where there is no special provision,[89] although a male person over eighteen years of age, whose disabilities have been removed by court pursuant to statute, has been held entitled to be examined as to his qualifications to practice law.[90]

§ 8. —— Preliminary Study and Clerkship

Compliance with statutory provisions and court rules with respect to the course and length of study is essential for admission to practice law

In nearly all the states the legislature has committed the course and length of study to be prescribed by the courts. As a rule the applicant must have studied law for a certain period either in a law school or while serving a clerkship in the office of a practicing attorney,[91] and in some jurisdictions courts have promulgated rules relating to general educational requirements.[92] The applicant, during his period of clerkship, must have been actually engaged in assisting the attorney whom he serves, in his business and under his control,[93]

Service in office of counselor necessary

Where there was a general overhauling of rules concerning admission to the bar fifteen months before a student began service under an attorney who was not a counselor, with whom he served for about six months before he became aware that rule 4–C, as amended, required service under a counselor, his application to be permitted to take an examination as though he had served under a counselor for such six months will be denied.—In re Schalick, 130 A. 520, 3 N J Misc 936.

and must have studied under the personal direction of the attorney[94] in an office within the jurisdiction.[95]

On failure in examination. In some jurisdictions, court rules require an applicant for an examination to serve a clerkship in the office of a counselor where he has failed in a previous examination, and this requirement has been held not satisfied by taking a course at law school during the prescribed period.[96] While such a rule has been held to apply to attorneys of other jurisdictions recently admitted,[97] it has also been held not to apply to attorneys of other jurisdictions with a long record of service.[98]

Reduction of term. The statutes quite generally provide for a reduction of the term of the clerkship on proof of the applicant having pursued classical studies to a certain extent.[99]

§ 9. Application for Admission

Applicants for admission to the bar or to bar examinations must comply with rules relating to application therefor, as filing of required certificates, etc

An application for admission to the bar filed before the effective date of an amending statute is not controlled by such amending statute.[1] Applicant should make a full disclosure of any criminal charges preferred against him,[2] notwithstanding such charges were subsequently dismissed.[3] After dismissal of a petition for admission to practice law, applicant may make a new application for admission.[4]

Admission to examinations. In some jurisdictions, court rules require a person intending to take bar examinations to post notices thereof and to file applications and certificates relative to his right to be admitted to such examinations, and such persons must fully comply with these rules and regulations.[5] In some states, an application for admission to bar examinations must be made by a counselor in open court on an affidavit or verified petition on the opening day of the term, as the court cannot consider informal oral applications by students at all sorts of times and places;[6] and a certificate as to preliminary education may not ordinarily be filed nunc pro tunc.[7] While it has been held that a certificate of commencement of clerkship filed in vacation will not be reckoned as relating to the previous term of court,[8] the filing of such certificate nunc pro tunc has sometimes been allowed.[9]

Clerkship must be regular daily employment

Under Court of Appeals Rules, rules 4, 5 (48 N E vi), applicant is not entitled to admission to the bar on a showing of perfunctory, nominal, or occasional attendance at a law office; but the rules require that his clerkship shall be his regular daily employment—In re Moskovits, 155 N Y S 485, 169 App Div. 527—6 C.J. p 577 note 20 [a].

Vacation period

Character committee could not refuse to certify applicant for admission to the bar because he worked in hotel during vacation applicable on the year of required clerkship—In re Klein, 169 N E 397, 252 N Y 316, reversing 233 N.Y S. 801, 226 App.Div. 659.

Change of court rule

Applicant to be admitted to a bar examination, who began his period of service of clerkship before the change of rule relating to filing, has been held entitled to permission to file a certificate nunc pro tunc—In re Trusdell, 130 A. 522, 3 N.J.Misc. 940.

Failure to post notices of intention to take bar examinations is not excused by inadvertence or unforeseen circumstances preventing such action immediately before the expiration of the time for filing such notices.[10]

Declaration of intention to open office. A court rule requiring applicant for admission to a county bar to file a written declaration of an intention to open his principal office in the county has been held not invalid.[11]

§ 10. Examination

Applicants for admission to the bar must submit to an examination to test their legal knowledge unless excepted therefrom by statute or rule of court.

An applicant for admission to the practice of law must possess the requisite ability and legal learning, to test which he must submit himself to an examination either by the court itself or by duly appointed examiners.[12] The law gives a large discretion to the examiners as to the regulations governing examinations, the exercise of which will not be reviewed unless there is a clear abuse thereof,[13] and there must be a compliance with the rules and regulations concerning the examination.[14]

Exceptions to rule. While it is sometimes provided by statute or rule of court that graduates of certain institutions of learning may be admitted without examination,[15] it has been held that the word "may" will not be construed to mean "must" or "shall" and the examiners may require such graduates to take an examination,[16] and such a statute has been held invalid as applied to persons graduating before the enactment thereof.[17]

Where the legislature, in prescribing the requirements for admission to practice has failed to make any provision for the rights of a person previously admitted to the lower courts, it has been held that it could not have been the intention of the legislature to have required of them a submission to the examination prescribed.[18]

Admission of attorneys from other jurisdictions is discussed infra § 15.

not one in equity,[20] it has also been held that the proceeding for admission is not an action at law, but is in the nature of an investigation by the court or its representatives to determine whether a particular candidate is qualified to become one of its officers.[21]

The usage by courts of employing members of the bar to ascertain the qualifications and character of applicants for membership is reasonable and valid,[22] and the question as to whether certificates of admission to the bar shall be granted hereafter to candidates denied certificates for cheating at examinations rests largely in the sound discretion of the board of law examiners.[23]

Procedure on denial of admission by examiners. Where a board of governors recommended admission, but the committee of bar examiners denied the application after due investigation, a motion to the court to be admitted to practice has been held the proper procedure.[24]

United States Board of Tax Appeals, on an application for permission to practice before it, may properly consider the record of hearing on a similar application before the treasury department,[25] and denial of such application because of alleged violation of duty by applicant has been held not an abuse of discretion,[26] although applicant should not be rejected on a charge of unfitness without an opportunity by notice for a hearing and answer.[27]

b. Issues

Moral fitness of applicant is in issue in proceeding for admission, and on review of action refusing application to take the examination, issue is as to fairness of committee's action.

An applicant seeking admission to the bar puts in issue his moral fitness,[28] and the question as to moral character raised by protest is directly presented when a creditable examination paper is tendered showing a competent knowledge of the law.[29] The fundamental issue on review of the action of a bar committee refusing to approve an application to take a bar examination is whether the committee acted fairly,[30] and evidence of the qualifications of applicant is properly excluded on such review.[31]

c. Evidence

Burden of establishing good moral character, or the erroneous decision of bar examiners, is on the applicant.

While applicant for admission to the bar is entitled to the presumption that he is morally fitted and but little evidence is required in support thereof,[32] nevertheless, he has the burden of establishing his good moral character.[33] When, however, he has made a prima facie showing and has paid his fee and taken the examination, one making objections to his admission has the burden of proceeding to offer evidence in support of the objections to overcome the prima facie showing,[34] and if the allegations of the objector are supported by sufficient evidence, the prima facie showing fails[35] No presumption of guilt arises from mere accusations made against applicant.[36]

Sufficiency. Cases treating of the sufficiency or the insufficiency of the evidence to show whether applicant is entitled to admission to practice law are set out in the note.[38]

d. Hearing

Inquiry as to moral character is broader in scope than in a disbarment proceeding Court will not act in contravention of examiners in absence of showing of fraud, unfairness, etc

Where formal applications are filed, the court will examine the entire record of the particular proceeding of the bar examiners complained of, such examination not being limited to the scope of a writ of certiorari,[39] and an inquiry as to the good moral character of applicant for admission is broader in its scope than that in a disbarment proceeding and may extend to his general character as well as to particular acts.[40] In their inquiry as to the moral character of an applicant for admission to the bar, the courts are not limited to the certificate presented by him, but will look behind it, and are bound to do so in cases attended with suspicious circumstances,[41] although there are cases holding such certificate conclusive[42] While the court may admit a petitioner to practice as an attorney without favorable action by the committee of bar examiners,[43] it will not exercise its power in contravention of the recommendation of the committee of bar examiners, except on a convincing showing that the adverse recommendation is not based on sound premises and valid reasoning,[44] and it will not inquire into applicant's inability to pass a bar examination unless he can show that he was prevented from passing through fraud, imposition, or coercion, or that he has been treated unfairly or unjustly,[45] as the general qualifications of applicant are not to be substituted for the requisite knowledge of law which he must possess in order to be admitted into the legal profession.[46]

An order declaring a bar examination void because of fraud and the impossibility of determining which applicants had benefited directly or indirectly therefrom cannot be set aside as to applicants showing that they had not participated in the fraud, nor benefited therefrom either directly or indirectly, since public policy demands absolute purity of bar examinations and a prompt disclosure of fraud of others by any applicant.[47]

Confronting witnesses. Applicant is entitled to confront the witnesses and to subject them to cross-examination and to invoke the protection of the rules of evidence.[48]

e. Review of Order in General

Appeal from court decision as to admission is not allowed in absence of statute or court rule conferring the right.

While it has been held that the court to which the application is made has the right to pass on the qualifications of applicant, and its decision is not subject to review by a higher court,[49] the right to appeal is sometimes expressly conferred.[50] However, one not a party to the ex parte proceeding for admission to the bar cannot appeal from the judgment therein.[51] In any case the exercise of discretionary power in passing on the qualifications of the applicant will not be reviewed unless there is a clear abuse of discretion.[52]

f. Setting Aside Order

The court may vacate the order of admission at the same term when granted; a person not a party to the admission proceeding may not move to vacate the order.

While the court has power on its own motion, at the same term at which it has granted one a license to practice law, to set aside such order,[53] as where it was obtained by fraudulent artifices or concealment of material facts,[54] a person opposed to the admission of applicant, not being a party to the proceeding to admit him, cannot move to vacate the judgment of admission.[55] Also, the court may correct the order at a later date to make it conform to the situation then existing.[56]

After a license to practice law has been granted, however, a motion will not lie at the relation of any person to vacate the order on the ground that the order granting the license has been obtained by fraud and false representations, proceedings for disbarment being the proper remedy.[57]

g. Collateral Attack

Granting of a license to practice is not subject to collateral attack.

The granting of a license to practice law being the exercise of a judicial function, as heretofore shown (see supra § 6), it is not the subject of collateral attack[58] and can only be impeached collaterally by what affirmatively appears on the face of the record.[59]

On admission to the bar applicant must take the oath of office by which he swears to support the constitution of his state and of the United States, and to discharge the duties of his office with honesty and faithfulness,[60] and the oath is simply declaratory of the obligations which rest on every individual coming to the bar, whether he has taken the oath or not.[61]

Where a court of appeals has no original jurisdiction, it has been held that no relief can be granted on an application for an order to permit an attorney, previously admitted, to file in the clerk's office an oath nunc pro tunc.[62]

Other oaths. In some jurisdictions, it is also required that applicant take additional oaths,[63] such as that he has not been and will not be in any way concerned in a duel, either as principal or second, and where such a requirement exists, it must of course be complied with before applicant can be admitted,[64] unless it is contrary to some provision of the state constitution.[65]

§ 13. Registration

Attorneys must comply with the court rules or statutes requiring registration. Some jurisdictions require registration of applicants prior to the beginning of the study of the law.

In the absence of a statute or rule of court requiring something further, the order of court admitting an attorney to practice is a sufficient registration; but it is usually required that attorneys sign the roll or file a certificate with the clerk of court that they have been duly admitted to practice, and, in absence of compliance therewith, it is unlawful for a person to practice law.[66] Where an attorney fails to have his name entered on the roll of attorneys at the date of his license, he cannot have it enrolled afterward nunc pro tunc.[67]

Registration preliminary to legal study. In some jurisdictions, registration prior to the beginning of applicant's term of study of the law is required, and such registration will not be allowed nunc pro tunc except in case of special circumstances.[68]

§ 14. Certificate or License

Securing of certificate of admission is generally necessary.

In order to constitute "admission to the bar" within the legal definition of that term, applicant must, in addition to the other requirements, secure a certificate of admission or license,[69] and a court will not grant a certificate of admission to practice as an attorney as of a prior date, when applicant was not then registered and enrolled as provided by statute.[70]

(1) In General

While an attorney has no right to admission on motion to the courts of another jurisdiction, such right is generally granted on compliance with prescribed conditions.

The admission to practice of attorneys admitted in another jurisdiction is generally authorized and regulated by statutes and rules of court in most jurisdictions, and compliance therewith is essential.[72] While an attorney admitted to practice in one state has no absolute or constitutional right to be admitted on motion as an attorney in other states,[73] the courts of most jurisdictions have followed the practice of admitting attorneys, without examination, on certificate of admission to the highest courts of other jurisdictions[74] and proof of practice therein for a prescribed time.[75] Although it has been stated that in many instances

Circumstances under which examination held necessary

Applicant was not entitled to admission to the bar without examination although he had been admitted to the Bar of Indiana in 1918, on recommendation of a law committee, without examination as to fitness, and had practiced law in that state until December, 1928, where he had subsequently made four applications for admission to the New Jersey Bar, but each time failed to pass the examination—In re De Vita, 291 N Y S 78, 249 App Div 63.

Actual practice

(1) That an attorney in a sister state had practiced for one year and ten months, and then removed to California, whence he claimed to have continued his practice by correspondence, has been held not a sufficient showing of actual practice for three out of seven years preceding his application for admission to the bar, required by Code Civ Proc § 279, to entitle him to admission—In re Scott, 234 P 128, 70 Cal App 716

(2) The fact that an attorney of another state was an actual resident and officeholder of Wisconsin has been held not to, of itself, interfere with his being engaged in actual practice in such other state—In re Pierce, 207 N.W. 966, 189 Wis 441

(2) Certificate of a judge of a sister state is not conclusive proof of practice in another state—In re Pierce, supra.

Admission denied where former practice highly specialized

Application for admission to the bar without examination was denied in view of the highly specialized and peculiar character of petitioner's prior practice—Henderson v State Bar of California, 28 P (2d) 915, 219 Cal 696

Certificate of permanent admission inadvertently omitted

Under Code Civ Proc § 279, one practicing law continuously in Washington for ten years, of which three were within seven years immediately preceding his application for admission to the California bar, is entitled to admission on motion, although the Washington supreme court, through inadvertence, granted him no certifi-courts have admitted attorneys from other jurisdictions without proof of good moral character,[76] it is now well settled that applicant must be possessed of a good moral character,[77] must be in good standing in the courts of the sister state,[78] and must be prepared to produce evidence of such standing,[79] as by certificate from the proper court.[80]

The principle of comity held inapplicable. There is no rule of comity between states requiring the courts of one state to admit a citizen thereof to the general practice of the law because he previously had been admitted to practice in another state.[81]

Recommendation of board of examiners In some jurisdictions, recommendation of the board of examiners is required, whether or not there be objections to the permanent admission to practice,[82] and while admission is ultimately and finally for the court and is a matter of broad discretion, the court could disregard or suspend the rule providing for recommendation, but it would have to be a plain case for it to feel justified in doing so.[83]

Temporary license. In some jurisdictions, an attorney applying for admission on motion may be granted a temporary license pending investigation concerning him, and, on a permanent admission being refused, the court may extend such temporary license to enable him to wind up any business begun.[84]

Attorney from foreign country. Some states admit without examination persons who have practiced a certain length of time in a foreign country provided the common law of England constitutes the basis of jurisprudence.[85]

Misconduct in youth

Admission to practice of an attorney of another state should not be refused for an act in the nature of an impropriety and under palliating circumstances, rather than a vicious wrong, more in the nature of a slip, which any young attorney might make and still intend to be honorable and upright, than of a deliberate intention to violate the ethics of the profession, nor for social immorality occurring a number of years ago when he was quite young, there being no evidence that his conduct in that regard has not since been good—Ex parte Keeley, (Or) 189 P 885

Turbulent and intemperate nature

Appearance before officer taking deposition

The appearance of an attorney not licensed to practice within the state, but licensed in the federal courts and courts of a foreign state, before an officer taking a deposition at the request of the attorney of the record, while improper practice, does not involve his moral character, nor is it sufficient to deprive him of his right to a license to practice law—Ex parte McCue, 293 P. 47, 211 Cal 57.

Going behind action of foreign court reinstating applicant

(2) Revocation

An order admitting an attorney may be revoked for cause, either in term time or in vacation.

An order admitting an attorney from another jurisdiction may be taken, modified, vacated, or revoked either in term time or in vacation,[86] and an intentional concealment of a fact which would affect the passage of an order of admission, or the making of a recommendation by another attorney, is such fraud as will authorize the revocation of the order of admission.[87] An order of admission, obtained by fraud or other improper means, may be corrected without proceedings for disbarment, and a proceeding by the solicitor-general to set aside the order because of fraud is a proper proceeding and can be brought in vacation,[88] and since the investigation relating to an attorney's fraud in procuring admission to practice on a certificate of a court in another jurisdiction is not a disbarment proceeding, the inquiry is not limited to acts occurring since the passage of a statute relating to disbarment.[89]

(3) Costs of Investigation

Statute making county liable for cost of investigation of charges of misconduct of attorney is applicable to investigation concerning admission of attorney from another jurisdiction

A statute providing for the liability of a county, on approval of the court, for expenses incurred by the board of examiners in investigating charges of misconduct, has been held applicable to the investigation of objections to the granting of a permanent license to an attorney from another state, practicing under a temporary license,[90] and the court is required to allow items of a cost bill that are correct, proper, and justly incurred,[91] the exercise of discretion being limited to the allowance or disallowance of particular items as it may appear that they are reasonable or otherwise, or that the services were actually rendered as claimed.[92]

b. For Trial of Particular Case

By universal usage and comity, an attorney is usually given the right to try a particular case in another jurisdiction.

While, as shown above, a citizen of one state, although possessed of all the requisite qualifications, has no absolute right to be admitted to practice in the courts of another state, one who is a regularly licensed attorney in one state is generally given, by universal usage and comity, the privilege to practice in the courts of other states in particular cases without going through the formality of an admission and license,[93] and the power of the legislature to provide the manner, terms, and conditions of the admission of attorneys to practice, does not deprive the courts of their inherent power, as a matter of comity, to permit an attorney from a sister state to appear and present argument in a particular case.[94] However, this right is not absolute; it is restricted to the trial of particular causes and does not authorize a general license to practice,[95] and usage and comity do not permit a resident of a state, although an attorney of another state, to accept employment

Appearance for removal of case to federal court

A statute providing that members of the bar of another state employed in a case pending in the state may be admitted for all purposes of the case in which they are so employed has been held to provide for admission ex gratia for the occasion, and not as members of the bar of the state.[97]

c. Joining Resident Attorney

In some jurisdictions, nonresident attorneys must associate themselves in good faith with a resident attorney for the trial of cases.

In some jurisdictions, nonresident attorneys must associate themselves in good faith with a resident attorney for the trial of cases[98] or must file a written appointment of a resident attorney on whom service may be had,[99] and such a requirement has been held not unreasonable or improper.[1] Where such requirements exist, a member of a foreign bar, not associated with a member of the bar of the jurisdiction trying the case, is not entitled to be introduced pro hac vice and has no audience before the court,[2] although where a nonresident attorney has been admitted pro hac vice on motion without joining a resident attorney as required, a subsequent order may be made nunc pro tunc of the appearance of a resident attorney.[3]

However, such a rule or statute has been held not to apply to a foreign attorney suing in his own behalf as plaintiff,[4] nor where resident and foreign attorneys are employed on the case by the client.[5]

a. In General

Power of the court in which action is brought to inquire whether an attorney appearing before it is one of its officers, entitled to appear and present issues, may be exercised on the court's own motion, however it may have been informed—Post v. Louis, 172 N.Y.S 561, 184 App Div. 533.

Association with attorney

Prohibition of practice of law by one not licensed is to be observed in fact as well as in theory, and that there may be associated in the trial of the case other persons actually licensed to practice law in nowise validates the participation of one not so authorized—People v. Munson, 150 N.E 280, 319 Ill 596.

In Louisiana

(1) There is no conflict between Rev St § 122, giving the right to appear and plead in person or by attorney at law or in fact, and Act (1908) No 66, imposing a penalty for practicing without license, and the last-mentioned act contemplates no interference with the exercise by any litigant of the right to appear and plead in any court of the state either in person or by his attorney at law duly qualified or his attorney in fact duly authorized, and there being no repealing clause, the later statute must be construed with the then existing legislation as to give effect to each, bearing in mind that the later statute governs in the event of an irreconcilable conflict—Howell v. Mundy, 82 So. 274, 145 La. 291.

(2) The right of any party to a lawsuit to be represented by his attorney in fact is not affected by the collateral question whether the attorney in fact is guilty of having practiced law without a license—Brown v. Guillot, 83 So. 373, 146 La 46.

(3) A litigant who has appeared and pleaded through an attorney in fact in a pending suit has an interest entitling him to intervene, through an attorney in fact, in a proceeding instituted by members of the bar against the attorney in fact through whom such pleadings were filed, to strike the same from the record and punish such attorney in fact for contempt upon the ground that or as the agent of his client.[7] A person who has no right to practice law directly cannot do so indirectly by employing licensed attorneys to practice for him.[8]

Exceptions to rule. Ordinarily, however, there is an exception to the general rule above stated, as to practice in courts not of record,[9] or not strictly of record.[10] An officer of a corporation who wrote an alleged debtor stating that his account had been placed in his hands for collection and that he would file suit in a justice court, using stationery on which was printed his name followed by words "attorney at law," notwithstanding he had no license to practice, was held within exception of the statute prohibiting practice of law by which any person may attend to its own claims out of court.[11] Services not essentially professional, and which do not involve appearance in any court, may be performed by an unlicensed person.[12]

Client representing himself in court. Except when public welfare demands otherwise,[13] the general rule above stated does not prevent any one from appearing in any cause in his own behalf,[14] or as guardian or next friend of an infant.[15]

Waiver of objection. The recognition of a person as attorney in the cause, after his actual admission to the bar, waives the objection that he was not admitted at the time of his first appearance in the cause.[16]

b. Effect on Proceedings

Proceedings in a suit by a person not licensed to practice are a nullity.

Proceedings in a suit by a person not entitled to practice are a nullity,[17] and the suit may be dismissed.[18] If the cause has proceeded to judgment, the judgment is void and will be reversed.[19] Briefs presented on appeal by persons not licensed to practice[20] in the appellate courts[21] will not be considered.

c. As an Offense

(1) Contempt
(2) Misdemeanor

(1) Contempt

Practicing law without being admitted constitutes a contempt of the court

The act of holding oneself out as an attorney without having a license constitutes contempt of court,[22] which the court has inherent power to punish,[23] and an express grant of authority to determine who shall practice as attorneys before the courts of the state has been held to carry with it the implied power to punish for contempt those pretending to the office,[24] and the supreme court may hold such persons in contempt notwithstanding the unauthorized acts took place in a lower court,[25] or outside of court.[26] A contempt proceeding has been held warranted notwithstanding the existence of a statute penalizing such acts,[27] although ordinarily the court will not resort to or exercise this drastic and extraordinary power unless necessary.[28]

Nature of proceeding. The contempt proceeding has been held to be criminal in its nature[29] regardless of the fact that the result of the proceeding inures to the individual benefit of properly licensed lawyers.[30]

Defenses. That a justice of peace and some others with whom one, making pretensions of being an attorney, did business, knew that he was not an attorney, does not affect the question of contempt,[31] and the granting of permission by a judge to appear in cases for a short time pending admission to the bar, although in palliation of the offense, is no excuse.[32] That no fee for the services was received is no defense.[33]

Punishment. The amount of fees received by such practice does not furnish the only basis for determining the punishment,[34] and in dealing with such a case the court may consider the lack of candor of the offender during the contempt proceeding.[35]

(2) Misdemeanor

Practicing law without being admitted constitutes a misdemeanor in some jurisdictions

In some jurisdictions, any person not duly licensed to practice law who holds himself out as an attorney and counselor at law, or who attempts to practice such profession, while liable for contempt, is also guilty of a misdemeanor,[36] and in the enactment of statutes making it an offense to practice law without a license, the legislature will be held to have intended only to protect the general public from exploitation, and not to protect the legal profession, especially since any such attempt of the latter kind would be invalid.[37] While an indictment or information containing allegations substantially in the language of the statute has been held sufficient,[38] an indictment not alleging that accused practiced law for a fee or reward has been held demurrable, although the offense is charged in the language of the statute.[39]

While there is no presumption that accused had been admitted to practice law and it is incumbent on him to show such right,[40] the state must prove that he practiced law for a fee or reward,[41] and a receipt for money is admissible with testimony that the witness paid accused for legal services.[42] Proof that accused performed only one act outside the court, such as preparing a bill of sale and chattel mortgage, has been held insufficient to sustain a conviction.[43]

Admission of a person to the bar is for life unless such right is revoked upon good cause shown. Change of residence to another jurisdiction may forfeit right to practice. Right to surrender license may be refused.

The act of May 16, 1905 (L [1905] p 190), declaring one holding himself out as attorney at law without being licensed to practice guilty of misdemeanor, is not so repugnant to act revising law concerning attorneys and counselors, as amended in 1917 (L [1917] p 205), as to render either void, the latter prohibiting practice of law without a license, by giving legal advice or representing client in court of record or before justice of peace.—People v. bar is for life unless the attorney is removed,[45] an attorney is liable to the summary jurisdiction of the court for misconduct and subject to disbarment, although at the time of an application against him he has ceased to practice as an attorney, and has gone into another business.[46]

Change of residence or absence from state. While absence of an attorney from a state does not of itself forfeit or abandon his right to practice law,[47] it has been held that a member of the bar of a state loses his right to practice there by changing his residence to another jurisdiction,[48] although he does not cease to represent his client in actions previously commenced until his client has substituted another attorney in his place.[49]

Surrender of certificate or resignation. An attorney may, with the consent of the court, resign his office and relinquish its rights and privileges.[50] A petition for leave to surrender his certificate for cancellation should allege that there are no outstanding matters to be disposed of by him, nor any proceedings pending for his disbarment, or that he has no reasonable apprehension of such proceedings being taken,[51] and an attorney's resignation should not be permitted where another has moved to strike his name from the roll of attorneys, or where he apprehends that some one may do so.[52]

Patent attorneys. Under a rule of the patent office, the powers of a patent attorney may be revoked at any stage in the proceedings upon application to, and approval by, the commissioner; and when so revoked, the office will communicate directly with applicant or such other attorney as he may appoint, and the attorney whose powers are revoked will be promptly notified thereof. The spirit of this rule requires that notice of such revocation should be given to the legal representatives of a deceased applicant.[53]

Summary jurisdiction

(1) The court by reason of the

and has been exercised from the earliest times,[55] and whenever a proper case is made out it is its duty to exercise it.[56] The power to disbar or suspend an attorney is judicial in its nature[57] and can be exercised only by the courts,[58] and cannot be defeated by the legislative or executive departments,[59] although statutes may regulate its exercise.[60] The suspension or cancellation of an attorney's license by a court exercising its inherent or statutory authority does not contravene either the federal or state constitutions.[61]

Power not an arbitrary one. The power is not an arbitrary and despotic one to be exercised at the pleasure of the court or because of passion, prejudice, or personal hostility;[62] it is rather one to be used with moderation and caution, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion,[63] and only in a clear case,[64] for the most weighty reasons,[65] and upon clear legal proof as hereafter shown infra § 33.

Distinct from right or power to punish for contempt. The right or power of suspension or disbarment is different and distinct from the power to punish for contempt.[66]

Place where misconduct committed. A court has jurisdiction to disbar an attorney for acts done in or out of court,[67] outside of the state[68] or in another court of the state[69] or while practicing before the federal courts,[70] or before the United States land office.[71]

Suspension pending disciplinary proceedings. It is not proper for courts ordinarily to deprive the accused of his rights as an attorney pending the investigation and trial of an application for disbarment;[72] nor will misconduct on the part of an attorney, although amounting to a contempt and furnishing cause for his removal or suspension, justify a court in excluding him from practicing at its bar when no judgment of removal or suspension has been rendered against him.[73] However, under statutes in some jurisdictions, where an attorney is convicted of a felony involving moral turpitude, he may be suspended by the court pending final action on the judgment of conviction.[74]

b. Particular Courts

Courts authorized to admit attorneys have inherent power to suspend or disbar them. Legislature may confer, on certain courts, exclusive jurisdiction to disbar attorneys

It is well settled that any court authorized to admit an attorney has inherent jurisdiction to suspend or disbar him for sufficient cause, and that such jurisdiction does not necessarily depend on any express constitutional provision or statutory enactment,[75] and conversely a court that has no jurisdiction to admit attorneys to practice has no jurisdiction to disbar them,[76] the jurisdiction to admit and disbar being deemed correlative.[77] Generally, all courts of record have power in a proper case to suspend or annul the license of an attorney practicing in the particular court pronouncing sentence,[78] but the power to go further and make the suspension or revocation effective in all other courts of the state must be conferred by statute[79] As there is no necessary connection between the power to admit to practice and the power to disbar for subsequent misconduct, the legislature may confer on any court the power to suspend or disbar,[80] but, where the statute vests the power to disbar or suspend in certain courts, a court not specified therein has no jurisdiction to act in such matters,[81] and, of course, such power can be exercised only by the courts of the jurisdiction where such attorney is a member of the bar.[82] A municipal court has been held to have no power to disbar or suspend attorneys for general misconduct or violation of the canons of ethics,[83] and a statute conferring power of disbarment upon any court of record does not include courts of limited jurisdiction only,[84] such as certain criminal courts.[85]

c. Bar Committee or Association

Statutes conferring power on bar committees or associations to make final orders as to suspension or disbarment are invalid; but statutes conferring power to make investigations and recommendations are not invalid.

The board of commissioners of a state bar has no authority to suspend or disbar an attorney,[91] and a statute giving commissioners of the state bar authority to suspend or disbar attorneys is void,[92] but a statute providing for the investigation of charges against attorneys by such organization, subject to review by the supreme court, is not invalid.[93] A state bar commission has jurisdiction to hear a disbarment proceeding notwithstanding the state bar commission did not exist at the time the attorney allegedly committed the acts of misconduct, as a new method of procedure may be employed in an inquiry into acts of misconduct occurring prior to the creation of such procedure,[94] and the mere appointment of a new committee by the court cannot and does not affect its jurisdiction in disbarment proceedings.[95]

d. Commissioner of Patents

The commissioner of patents has power to suspend or disbar attorneys from practicing before that department.

The commissioner of patents may, after notice and opportunity for a hearing, suspend or exclude from further practice an agent or attorney who has violated or refused to comply with such regulations. The commissioner's hearing and determination of charges against a patent agent or attorney and the secretary's approval of the commissioner's findings are judicial functions;[96] but as congress has the right to vest the commissioner and the secretary with such judicial functions, it also has the power to authorize them to delegate such functions to an assistant, and therefore the act of congress which provides that the assistant secretary of the interior shall perform such duties in the department as shall be prescribed by the secretary is not limited to merely administrative duties, but authorizes the secretary to delegate to the assistant the judicial duty of approving the findings of the commissioner of patents in proceedings for the disbarment of a patent solicitor.[97]

§ 19. Grounds for Suspension or Disbarment

Any conduct on the part of an attorney evidencing his unfitness for the confidence and trust which attend the relationship of attorney and client or unworthy of public confidence constitutes a ground for suspension or disbarment.

Attorneys, in performance of the obligations and duties assumed, must conform to certain standards in relation to their clients, to the court, to the profession, and to the public,[98] and an attorney can be deprived of his rights as an attorney by the judgment of the court for moral or professional delinquency.[99] While a license to engage in the practice of law will not be revoked for trivial causes, impropriety, or breaches of good taste,[1] discipline for misconduct is not limited to cases where the attorney's acts are infamous or of a gross or serious nature,[2] and the courts will ordinarily discipline lawyers for offenses involving moral turpitude.[3] Also, in order that acts or conduct should be ground for striking the name of an attorney from the rolls it is not essential that they be such as would subject him to indictment or to any civil liability.[4] Conversely, the fact that misconduct charged against an attorney may also render him liable to punishment under the criminal laws does not necessarily deprive the court of power to hear disbarment proceedings against him.[5] Any conduct on the part of an attorney evidencing his unfitness for the confidence and trust which attend the relation of attorney and client and the practice of law before the courts, or showing such a lack of personal honesty or of good moral character as to render him unworthy of public confidence, constitutes a ground for his disbarment.[6]

Any conduct which would preclude the admission of an applicant to the bar will justify his disbarment, after he is admitted;[7] among other things, a want of good moral character (infra § 20), insanity,[8] or ignorance of the law.[9] However, misconduct occurring previous to the admission of an attorney to practice, while it may be ground for refusing him a license, is generally not ground for disbarment,[10] although the evidence of such misconduct is material and relevant and may, under certain circumstances, and in connection with acts shown to have been done after admission, be sufficient to require disbarment.[11]

Legislative limitation of power. Although it is well settled that the legislature may provide that certain acts or conduct shall require a disbarment,[12] the accepted doctrine is that statutes and rules merely regulate the power to disbar instead of creating it,[13] and that such statutes do not restrict the general powers of the court over attorneys, who are its officers, and that they may be removed for other than statutory grounds.[14] In a few jurisdictions, however, the view obtains, that an enumeration of the grounds of disbarment by statute deprives the court of the power to disbar for causes other than those so specified.[15]

Statute broad enough to cover all grounds

Pub.Acts (1913) c 42, § 1, prescribing the grounds of disbarment from practice in state courts and prescribing penalties and procedure in disbarment cases, is sufficiently broad to embrace any cases demanding suspension or disbarment, and under subs 5 power was conferred to punish defendants guilty of unprofessional conduct, dishonesty, malpractice, or any conduct which renders them unfit to be members of the bar commensurate with their offenses by either suspension or disbarment.—In re Hickey, 258 S.W. 417, 149 Tenn 344.

Reenacted statute previously construed

Where a statute giving grounds for disbarment of an attorney was construed by the court of final jurisdiction and was thereafter reenacted without material change, to give the statute a new construction disbarring an attorney on a new ground would be in effect disbarring the attorney by a law not previously prescribing the offense.—Lotto v. the wrongdoing must have been intentional in order to constitute cause for the disbarment of an attorney; that not only must the act itself be proved to have been committed, but the bad or fraudulent motive for the commission thereof must also be established, either from the act itself or from proof of other circumstances, and that unless this is done disbarment is not authorized,[16] but this is not true in all jurisdictions.[17]

§ 20. —— Want or Loss of Moral Character

When an attorney's character is bad in such respects as to show him unfit to be trusted with the powers of an attorney, he may be disbarred.

The relation of the court and its attorneys to the people is one of high responsibility, involving complete trust and confidence and absolute fidelity and integrity.[18] As good character is an essential qualification for the admission of an attorney to practice, he may be removed whenever he ceases to possess such a character.[19] To warrant the removal, however, the attorney's character must be bad in such respects as to show that he is unsafe and unfit to be trusted with the powers of an attorney,[20] as conduct which is merely discreditable to the attorney, but not dishonorable or criminal conduct, may not be ground for suspension or disbarment.[21]

Immoral conduct is that conduct which is willful, flagrant, or shameless, and which shows a moral indifference to the opinion of the good and respectable members of the community.[22]

a. In General

An attorney may be disbarred where guilty of conduct amounting to a crime involving moral turpitude.

Although conviction of a crime not involving moral turpitude may not warrant disbarment,[23] the commission or conviction of an attorney of a felony or other crime involving moral turpitude is generally made a ground for suspension or disbarment by statute, and even in the absence of a statutory provision such conduct is a sufficient cause for disbarment,[24] although the offense was not committed in his professional capacity.[25] While

Either felony or misdemeanor

(1) Under Code Civ Proc. § 287, providing that an attorney may be suspended on the ground that he has been convicted "of a felony or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude," it is immaterial whether the crime is a felony or misdemeanor as defined by Pen Code § 17—In re Thompson, 174 P. 86, 37 Cal App 344.

Failure to certify copy of conviction

Noncompliance with Rev Codes § 4003, relating to the transmission of a certified copy of record of an attorney's conviction, does not deprive the court of power, or relieve it of the duty to proceed, upon its own motion, in disbarment cases, when the facts justifying such action are brought to its attention—In re Hofstede, 173 P 1037, 31 Idaho 448.

Moral turpitude

(1) It has been stated that a concept of moral turpitude, as respects disbarment of an attorney, depends on the state of public morals, and may vary according to the community and the times—In re Bartos, (D C Neb) 13 F (2d) 138, reversed on other grounds (C C A) Bartos v. U S District Court for District of Nebraska, 19 F.(2d) 722

(2) This is doubtless so when viewed solely as a question of morals and long periods of time are taken into consideration, but when private rights are being adjudicated they are determined by rules of the civil law, not the moral, and so the civil law fixes a definite meaning to the phrase—Bartos v. U. S District Court for District of Nebraska, (C C.A Neb) 19 F.(2d) 722, reversing (D C) In re Bartos, 13 F.(2d) 138.

(4) It has also been defined to be an act of baseness, vileness, or depravity in the private and social duties which a man owes to his fellowmen or to society in general—Bartos v U S District Court for District of Nebraska, (C C A Neb) 19 F (2d) 722, reversing (D C.) (5) It implies something immoral in itself, regardless of the fact whether it is punishable by law. The doing of the act itself, and not its prohibition by statute, fixes the moral turpitude—Bartos v. U. S. District Court for District of Nebraska, (C C A Neb.) 19 F.(2d) 722, reversing (D C) In re Bartos, 13 F (2d) 138.

(1) The statute regulating admission to practice of law did not impliedly repeal the statute prohibiting persons convicted of felony from practicing law—Commonwealth v. Porter, 46 S W (2d) 1096, 242 Ky. 561

(2) Revisal (1905) § 211, providing for the disbarment where attorneys had been convicted of crime rendering them unfit to practice law, was held not repealed by Acts (1907) c 941, providing for disbarment on conviction of felony—State v. Johnson, 88 S E 487, 171 N C. 799.

Where a statute authorizes a commission to investigate and pass on all complaints that may be made concerning their unprofessional conduct, it has been held that the commission cannot disbar an attorney for his conviction of a crime unconnected with his practice of the law—In re Dampier, 267 P. 452, 46 Idaho 195

it has been held that a judgment of conviction must have been rendered by a court of record[26] on prosecution by the state in its own name for a violation of state laws as distinguished from a prosecution by a city for the violation of an ordinance,[27] a conviction in the court of another state[28] or in a federal court[29] has been held sufficient to authorize disbarment, although it has been held that the offense must involve moral turpitude within the meaning thereof in the jurisdiction where disbarment is sought.[30] The record of conviction is sometimes made conclusive evidence of the attorney's unfitness, as shown infra § 33, and sometimes operates per se as a disbarment,[31] but in order to have this effect the crime must come within the statute.[32]

Acts held not to constitute crime

Where defendant, in personal injury action, introduced record show-of marriage,[72] violation of Blue Sky Law,[73] violation of Draft Act,[74] willful publication of false and scandalous matter,[75] willfully secreting public records,[76] and using the mails to defraud.[77]

b. Necessity of Previous Conviction

While pendency of criminal proceedings is not a bar to disbarment proceedings, ordinarily the court will not entertain such proceedings pending the outcome of the criminal action, where the attorney has violated the law in a matter distinct from his professional conduct.

While the pendency of criminal proceedings is generally not a bar to disbarment proceedings,[78] ordinarily when an attorney has violated the laws of the state in a matter distinct from his professional conduct, that is, when the act or offense is committed in his private capacity and not by virtue of his office as an attorney, courts will not entertain any proceedings for his disbarment until after he has been convicted of the offense charged,[79] or at least until sufficient time has elapsed to afford the proper authorities opportunity to prosecute the accused.[80] Yet the rule is not an inflexible one; there may be cases in which it is proper for the court to proceed without such previous conviction, and such power has frequently been exercised.[81]

Where the conduct charged as the ground for removal falls within the sphere of official duty, it is of no moment that it also amounts to an offense against the criminal laws as heretofore shown supra § 19, and the power of the court to disbar in such case will not be withheld until after conviction,[82] although the court may in its discretion withhold the exercise of this power as the facts of any particular case may suggest would be appropriate.[83]

c. Effect of Appeal and Reversal

Ordinarily conviction of a crime involving moral turpitude is a ground for disbarment, notwithstanding an appeal has been taken, but on reversal an application for vacation of the order of disbarment may be made.

ing plaintiff had pleaded guilty to petit larceny, but in fact he had not pleaded guilty and had not been arrested, and plea had been entered without his knowledge by attorney, plaintiff's attorney, by eliciting plaintiff's testimony that he had not pleaded guilty and had never been arrested, with knowledge that record showed entry of plea of guilty, was not guilty of subornation of perjury, alleged as ground for disbarment.—In re Sizer, 267 S.W. 922, 306 Mo. 356.

Final judgment or order before conviction

A disbarment proceeding tried before L. (1919) p. 151, went into effect, was under Rev.St.(1909) § 960, under which no final judgment suspending for a definite time could be made for an indictable offense in the absence of indictment and conviction, and a disbarment or suspension for twelve months is such a final judgment, since it does not suspend until indictment might be secured and trial had thereon, but finally disposes of the case charging costs to the party disbarred.—Jones v. Sanderson, 229 S.W. 1087, 287 Mo. 176.

Extortion

Letter by one attorney to another was held a threat to institute disbarment proceedings unless property was surrendered, and comes within extortion statutes.—In re Sherin, 210 N.W. 507, 50 S.D. 428.

83. Ex p. Tyler, 40 P. 32, 107 Cal. 78.

It is held in some cases that an appeal so suspends the judgment in a criminal case that the attorney is not liable to be disbarred as for a conviction of a crime pending the determination of such appeal;[84] but the better rule seems to be that when an attorney has been convicted of a crime it is sufficient cause for his disbarment or suspension as an attorney, notwithstanding an appeal has been taken and is pending from the conviction.[85]

Reversal of an attorney's conviction because the statute under which the prosecution was laid was void for uncertainty does not preclude a disbarment proceeding for acts which constituted the basis of the criminal prosecution.[86] Where disbarment automatically follows on conviction of a felony as heretofore shown supra § 21 a, if the conviction is reversed on appeal a proper application for vacation of the order of disbarment may then be made.[87]

d. Effect of Acquittal, Pardon, Service of Sentence, Etc.

An acquittal, pardon, suspension of sentence, etc., is no bar or defense to a disbarment proceeding.

In a proceeding to disbar an attorney on the ground that he has been convicted of a crime, the fact that he may have been restored to his rights of citizenship by pardon,[88] by serving out his term of imprisonment,[89] or by the payment of a fine[90] or the suspension of sentence,[91] is not, in most jurisdictions, a defense to proceedings for disbarment; but there are decisions to the contrary.[92] And in any case it is usual for the court to examine the proofs of alleged innocence in determining whether or not the order of disbarment should be vacated.[93] Even an acquittal upon a criminal charge does not prevent the disbarment of an attorney, where it clearly appears that the misconduct under investigation rendered him unfit to be intrusted with the powers and duties of his profession,[94] but the contrary has also been held.[95] Also, the entry of a nolle prosequi in a prosecution begun will not terminate a proceeding to disbar, nor prevent disbarment of, an attorney where the conduct under investigation may show him unfit to be intrusted with the powers and duties of his profession.[96]

§ 22. —— Fraud in Procuring Admission

Fraud in the procuring of admission to the bar is a ground for disbarment.

Statutes sometimes expressly confer power on the courts to remove from office an attorney or counselor who has been guilty of any fraud or deceit in the proceedings by which he was admitted to practice, and even in the absence of such a statute the fraudulent procurement of admission to practice is good ground for disbarment, such conduct making the attorney unfit to be a member of the legal profession and being an imposition on the court.[97]
